who had yet to get their "baptism of fire," while the policemen were drawn from the ranks of the old samurai. And I have it on the authority of my own students who were sent from Tokyo to work the newly organised field telegraphs, that the Imperialist soldiers would not face the Satsuma men at Tawara-zaka and other places where the biggest battles were fought, until they had been liberally supplied with Dutch courage. This is a strange statement to make of men who have since stormed the heights of Port Arthur and driven back the legions of the Czar on a hundred battlefields. But it is easily explained. They were a new army, as I have said, with no traditions of fighting to maintain whilst the enemy were not only their own countrymen but samurai of the most warlike type, accustomed to the use of weapons of every kind, especially the much-dreaded sword, and animated by the fierce resentment of their cause. The inevitable jealousy that arose between the soldiers and the policemen long survived the suppression of the rebellion, and was often displayed in curious ways in the streets of the capital.

Turning now to the Japanese navy, it is extremely interesting to note that it consisted of but nine ships carrying about fifty guns—a startling contrast to the magnificent fleet recently reviewed by the Emperor off these shores. With the aid, however, of some forty merchant steamers which acted as transports, the Government experienced no difficulty in keeping control of the neighbouring waters, this being important in preventing communication with the mainland and the island of Shikoku, where disaffection was brooding and might have broken out under other and more favourable circumstances.

It is unnecessary for our present purpose to trace the course of the rebellion further than to say that after considerable and severe fighting around and especially to the north of Kumamoto, the relief of the garrison there was ultimately effected on the 14th April, from which date, it may be said, the fate of the insurgents was sealed. But Saigo, and the great bulk of his followers, succeeded in breaking through the Imperial forces and making good their retreat southwards and eastwards by the intricate mountain paths of that part of the country. The losses, up to this time, on the Imperial side alone amounted to nearly eleven thousand killed and wounded. The rebels now divided into three bodies, the largest retiring upon Hitoyoshi, situated at the headwaters of the Kumagawa, a river since become well-known to foreign travellers for its fine rapids and pretty scenery. Another body marched towards Nobeoka, a castle-town on the East Coast, whither Saigo himself finally proceeded after the defeat of his main body at Yatsushiro and Hitoyoshi. This brings us close to the date and scene of the first of Captain Hubbard's letters, wherein he describes some of the desperate fighting that took place in the high mountain passes to the north and around the town of Nobeoka itself, just before Saigo fell back for his final stand at Kagoshima, which is also graphically depicted in the last letter. This last letter, it may be pointed out, has the importance of a genuine footnote to history. The only detailed account of the Satsuma Rebellion, published in English, or indeed any foreign language, is Mr. Mounsey's admirable monograph, which appeared in 1879. It possesses all the advantages of having been written shortly after the events occurred,—an excellent time for the collection of records upon which history is based, but it may be doubted whether the best for the writing of history itself. Time is necessary, not only that a clearer perspective may be obtained, but that further light may be thrown on many of the controversial points inevitably associated with upheavals of the kind. The final assault by the Government troops on Shiroyama, the hill at Kagoshima, where Saigo and five hundred of his devoted followers made their last stand, took place on the 24th Sept. When they saw that the end was near, Hemmi, one of Saigo's lieutenants, severed his chief's head from his body in order to spare him the disgrace of falling alive into the enemy's hands, and after the head had been hurriedly buried, Hemmi himself committed suicide. According to Mounsey, on the day succeeding the combat, the dead were brought down from the battle-field on the hill into the town for identification and burial when all the bodies of the rebel leaders except that of Saigo were recognised. But close by lay the headless trunk of a tall, well-formed powerful man, and whilst the officers of the Imperial army were discussing as to whether the body was that of Saigo or not, a head was brought in which fitted the trunk and was identified as the head of the great rebel commander.

Now, Captain Hubbard says he went on shore on the 24th Sept., almost immediately after the firing had ceased, proceeded to the scene of the conflict on Shiroyama, and while looking at the bodies of the dead leaders, Saigo's head was brought in and placed by the body. Mounsey's account of this episode as having taken place on the day following, that is the 25th Sept., is therefore manifestly incorrect. Nor is it easy to understand how there could have been any uncertainty as to identification, for amongst the Imperial officers, were Admiral Kawamura and other personal friends of the dead hero. Besides, Saigo was physically, for a Japanese, a very remarkable man. Capt. Hubbard remarks that "any one would have said at once that he must have been the leader." His statue, which now stands in Ueno Park, is acknowledged to be a life-like semblance of the man, and is additional evidence, were such needed, on the point. In such wise ended the last struggle on Japanese soil to retard that progress which has since given the country her legitimate place amongst the great ones of the earth.

Mrs. Hubbard then, at the President's invitation, ascended the platform and read the Letters. The first, dated at Nobeoka, August 22nd, 1877, began with an account of a violent rainstorm encountered in the Bungo Channel leading into the Inland Sea, and then proceeded.—

The 12th found us in the pretty little harbor of Tonoura, 323 miles from Kobe; this place is in the province of Hiuuga. The rebels had been there two weeks before, and then gone further north. We were at Tonoura only four hours, when we were ordered to Aburatsubo, 10 miles further north. At daylight on the 13th, we left Aburatsubo for Hososhima, about 60 miles to the northward. We had a cargo of army food, rice, daikon and salt plums, so had to follow on after the army, which would keep us a long time on the voyage. A run of seven hours brought us to Hososhima, a small harbor, which in ordinary times we would think to be crowded with six ships, but we found here thirteen steamers, large and small, among them the Costa Rica and Candia. I crowded in, and made No. 14, to the disgust of those near me. If a typhoon had come along, it would have wrecked half the fleet. Fortunately the weather continued fine, and we got off without accident. We were at this place two days without discharging any cargo. Hososhima was the headquarters of the army; the Commander-in-Chief was here, so we had music several times a day from the band which accompanies him. Here we were getting near the rebels and have only to climb the hills to hear reports of the large and small guns in the distance. On the 15th at 6 p.m. just as we sat down to dinner, orders came for us to leave at once, with two officers for Nobeoka, 13 miles north. At 6.30 we started, and at 8 o'clock, dropped our anchor, expecting to return to Hososhima the same night, but we are here yet and likely to remain some days longer. Nobeoka is an exposed anchorage, no harbor, entirely open to the sea and ocean swell from N.E. to South, and if it came on to blow from seaward, we would have to leave at once. Nobeoka has been, until the past few days, the last of the rebel strongholds; here they had a large hospital, where their wounded had been collecting for months. On the 14th the Imperialists captured Nobeoka, after several days' fighting, and it is said their hospitals were burned, and many hundreds perished in the flames. On the 17th and 18th the firing was incessant from daylight until dark. We could see from the steamer the smoke of both sides, and trace them among the hills and valleys as the rebels fell back, and the Imperialists advanced. On the 17th the rebels were driven about two miles to the north of Nobeoka, and about 700 prisoners were captured, but the 18th was the decisive day. I was on shore all day, and got up on a high hill, where I could see something of the fight; there seemed to be many thousands engaged on both sides. After two o'clock the rebels retreated, and at dark when I walked into Nobeoka, it was said the rebels were entirely surrounded and that night would finish them. The firing of large and small guns continued through the night until four o'clock, when it entirely ceased, and we have not heard the sound of a gun since.

On the 19th, in company with a friend, I went on shore. Nobeoka is on a small river about four miles from its mouth, and near the entrance are several branches to the northward. As soon as we entered the river we saw boats coming with rebel prisoners; they were being put on a small island in the river. As we passed close to many of the boats, we could see them well, and they were indeed a hard looking crowd, and plainly showed the fatigues they have undergone during the past six months, while being hunted from place to place. We learned that in the two days' fight 5,200 prisoners had been taken; but Saigo and Kirino, with the other leaders, with about 5,000 samurai had broken out of the magic circle and disappeared as they done so often before. During the day we talked with several officers on the situation of affairs; some thought the war would soon be finished, and others thought a great many soldiers would be kept on the island until every rebel had disappeared, and that would take many months to accomplish; to me the end seems a long way off. After pulling up the river two miles, we landed and walked across the country constantly meeting Imperial soldiers and rebel prisoners, and wounded of both sides.

The roads being narrow, we had a good view of everything that passed. After a three mile walk, we came to a village, and every house was occupied by soldiers. In one house we were shown a large quantity of arms that had been captured the day before. There were old Springfield muskets, Spencer and Remington Rifles, but among the most numerous of the firearms were the old fashioned match-locks. The swords were in a pile at least ten feet high from the ground, and were all sizes and lengths, and looked as though they had seen very rough usage. Going through the village we came to a river with quite a strong current; here was a pontoon bridge of boats, which reminded me of those I used to see in our Civil War. The bridge was quite strongly built and that day a constant stream of soldiers was crossing in both directions; also many wounded.

We saw many dead bodies floating away to sea; all appeared to be rebels. Soldiers were stationed on the bridge to prevent the bodies from getting foul of the boats and bridge. While crossing we counted nine dead rebels. Another two mile walk brought us to the battle ground of the 17th, but the only indications of the recent fight were the marks of bullets on the trees here and there; the fields were ploughed up with large balls, and a few houses burned to the ground. The dead and wounded had all disappeared, and there was not much that was interesting to pay us for our long walk in the hot sun. We took a rest with some officers near the outer picket line, and all enjoyed the good lunch we brought with us. At 2 p.m. we started on our return. We came into charming views every few minutes, and the scenery amply repaid us for our long walk. At the pontoon bridge we were fortunate in getting a boat, and rigging some mats for an awning went rapidly down the beautiful stream, the only unpleasant thing being the dead rebels we were continually passing. At 4 p.m. we reached our gig and then we decided to pull over to the island, and have a look at the prisoners; we found them all lying down on the ground under the trees, and appearing quite used up; they were black with dirt, and their clothes were of all sorts, sizes and description; hats of the greatest variety, and the worst looking that one could imagine; white and black felts of all shapes, and before we finished our inspection, my attention was called to two fellows in black frock coats, no pants, and tall black hats. None were tied, and all very lightly guarded—we thought one soldier to fifty men, but the poor fellows looked too used up to attempt to escape. At one place, the guard was talking with them, and we learned they expressed themselves as quite tired of the war, and glad to give themselves up; they said the leaders and many samurai would fight until the last and never give in. We thought the majority of the prisoners were coolies, although many were soldiers. I did not see or hear of one man who had been an officer in the rebel army. I fancy they were too wary to be caught, well knowing they would not have much chance for their lives if taken. We spent nearly three hours in walking about among the groups of rebels, and then walked along the beach to the mouth of the river, where the rebels had erected a sandbag battery; and here to our astonishment we found two wooden cannon; one was 8 ft. 6 in. long with a 9 inch bore; it was made of two hollow pieces of wood, and hooped its entire length with bamboo hoops; it was strongly made, and did not appear to have been used, but was mounted on a pile of sand bags ready for use. A smaller one, about 6 ft long, was lying near and dismantled; this had been fired, and was badly burst. The rebels had erected numerous batteries on both sides of the river at Nobeoka, and here, and at Hososhima, 13 miles south, they had in a rude manner fortified the approaches to the places, making it quite evident that they did not expect the Imperial Army would cross the mountains in pursuit of them but would send the troops round the coast in transports, when they would have been prepared to oppose a landing; and I have no doubt a Hososhima (where they had several brass, cannon mounted on the points at the entrance to the harbour) and here at Nobeoka, many lives would have been lost in forcing a landing. From all we could learn, the fighting in this part of the country is finished, as the rebels have disappeared, and it seems uncertain in what direction they have gone. Since the morning of the 19th not a shot has been fired, and the Imperialists are moving off in pursuit of the rebels, some across the mountains to the west and many to the north; but I fancy it will take some time to find them, and they will turn up in some place where they are not expected.

To-day the Tsuruga Maru and the Shimoneya Maru came in and were immediately dispatched loaded with troops for Tsurusaki, in Bingo province, near Funai. The Montan and several small steamers that have come round from Hososhima leave to night, all loaded with troops, so I fancy the Rebels have been heard from to the northward. This afternoon we saw a fleet of boats coming out of the river loaded with men, and as they passed close to us, we saw they were rebel prisoners; they are being taken to the Island of Fukushima, about 12 miles north of Nobeoka. It is a small island $\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile wide, and is three miles from the nearest coast, quite far enough to prevent them from escaping. We counted sixty-seven boats past, and as each boat would carry thirty men, there must be about two thousand on this small island. The Tamamura Maru is to-day from Hososhima; they left eleven steamers there. The three largest were loading troops for Kumamoto and Nagasaki, so it must be imagined that Saigo will turn up on the west coast again.

A month later Captain Hubbard wrote from Kagoshima:—We arrived at Kagoshima from Hososhima on the 20th at 11.45 a.m., and left in the evening and went ten miles up the gulf to Hadziki, where we landed our soldiers, and some cargo, returning on the evening of the 21st to Kagoshima, and we expect to remain here five days. Yesterday I went on shore with two friends and we walked for three hours over the ground once occupied by the pretty city of Kagoshima. Before the war, there were many thousand houses; now I don't think there are fifty left, and the fireproof godowns remind me of the burnt district in Tokyo, after the great fire last year. I walked about among the ruins, failing to recognize a single locality I before knew so well. About two-thirds of the ground formerly occupied by the city is in possession of the Imperialists, and the other third the Rebels hold. This third is at the base of a steep hill and the hill itself. This hill is about a mile in height, half a mile in width, with hills on its three sides, and the city of Kagoshima in front. The hill is entirely surrounded by the Imperialists and they have now constructed such strong breastworks, it seems impossible for the Rebels even to escape from the net work guarded by 2,000 Imperial troops; they will probably hold out until their provisions are ended, and then give up, or kill themselves. The Imperialists evidently do not mean to leave their entrenchments and attack them, as that would involve the loss of many lives; they keep watch behind their breastworks, and if a Rebel shows himself, he is at once fired on. They keep firing cannon, and throwing shells on to the hill night and day, but the Rebels never fire a shot, and have not for a week past. It is thought their ammunition is expended. Should they try to cut their way out, they must be worsted, as it seems impossible for them ever to get through the network, before getting to the breastworks. To cut their way out, they would first encounter a strong bamboo fence, so crossed as to form a diamond fence; this is seven feet high; behind this are boards on the ground studded with iron nails; then a ditch four feet deep, and twelve feet wide; then a frame work of strips of bamboo, tied in squares and raised two feet from the ground, and twenty feet wide, the squares just right for a man to step in, and flounder about, without making much progress. Then another deep ditch twenty feet wide filled with small branches of trees; and then comes the main breastwork, behind which the soldiers are constantly on watch. This breastwork is made of earth and straw bags filled with earth, and is a strong work about 8 ft. wide at the base and 2 ft. wide at the top, and has on the inside an embankment, where the Imperial soldiers keep watch night and day. These works extend across the city about two or three miles. On the hills the nature of the ground is such and the hills so steep that extensive works are not required. There is not much chance for the Rebels to escape, and when their food is gone, they must give in—and end the rebellion.

Monday, September 24, 1877.

How many changes will take place in a day. Yesterday, when interrupted in my writing, the guns were booming, and shells bursting over the hill occupied by the Rebels, and the war seemed likely to last some time longer; now, to-day, the war is ended, and Saigo, Kirino, Murata, and every leader of the rebellion dead. But let me describe things as they have occurred. When I retired last night at nine o'clock the firing was unusually heavy, and I thought something must be going on more than we had seen before. I found it impossible to sleep with such a noise. I was on deck every hour till three o'clock, when the firing ceased, and all was still. At four o'clock, commenced the popping of rifles, and we knew an attack was being made, but from which side it was impossible to say; we could only see the flashes of the rifles on the hill; but as daylight came on, it was evident the Imperialists were attacking the Rebels. As the sun rose, we saw the hill was covered with Imperial soldiers, and could watch them as they made their way into the hollows and valleys and hunted out the Rebels. The firing was all on one side, as the Rebels had no ammunition. The firing lasted until a few minutes before eight o'clock, when all was over, and the news went through the fleet that Saigo, his officers and 500 men were killed, and 1000 prisoners taken—and the Satsuma rebellion ended. After breakfast, in company with three others, I went on shore. After landing we heard that the bodies of Saigo and others had been brought in, and were laying on a hill close to the breastworks. Hundreds of soldiers and coolies were going up the hill; we joined the crowd, and were soon at the top. When we arrived there were but eight bodies; they lay in two rows; the first was Saigo; he was a large powerful man, his skin almost white; his clothing had been taken off and he lay there naked; it was a minute before I discovered his head was cut off. Next to Saigo, lay Kirino, then Murata. Saigo was the only headless body, but the others were a fearful sight to look at; they were dreadfully cut up about the head, and it was quite evident that they killed each other; and no doubt their heads would all have been cut off by their own people had time permitted. While looking at the bodies Saigo head was brought in, and placed by his body. It was a remarkable looking head, and anyone would have said at once that he must have been the leader. Such a sight we could not long look on, so we made our way down the hill, meeting about twenty dead Rebels being carried up. From the hill to the battleground was a long line of coolies bringing in the dead Rebels. On the way to the boat we branched off a little, and went to a large enclosure where there were about a hundred prisoners; they were a hard-looking set, many of them quite young, and some grey-headed. All looked sorrowful and dejected. An officer who was there said that they were samurai, and would probably lose their heads. We wandered about among the prisoners until noon when we went on board. The others started off for the hill where the Satsuma leaders and others had met their end, but I had seen horrible sights enough, and longed to get away from them. On their return they said the dead were being put in their graves, and this is no doubt the closing act of the rebellion.

On the motion of the President a hearty vote of thanks was accorded Mrs. Hubbard and Mr. Mason, the loud applause testifying to the deep interest which the audience had taken in the paper. Allusion was made to the peculiar position which Saigo Takamori occupies in the hearts of the Japanese people and of his extraordinary foresightedness in foreseeing the Japan-Russia conflict thirty years before the clash came, as only recently told to the world by Vice Admiral Kamimura, one of Saigo's protégés.

The following musical programme, which introduced several new performers to Yokohama, was then proceeded with:

CHINA.

Friday, November 24.

Telegrams to the Hochi Shimbun from Peking say that the second meeting of Plenipotentiaries took place on the 23rd instant. The points made by the Chinese were, first, that the period for the lease of Liaotung should be definitely fixed and that Japan should engage, as Russia had done, to restore the territory to its Sovereign at the conclusion of that period. Secondly, that with regard to the Changchun-Port-Arthur Railway also a period should be indicated for Japan's tenure, and that at the expiration of that period the line should either be handed over without charge to China, or be purchased by her at a fair price. Thirdly, that as there are, along the line of railway, various mines already worked by Chinese subjects, these should be excepted from the general concession sought by Japan. Fourthly, that the railway guards should be Chinese.

From the same source we learn that the Viceroy having been consulted about the expediency of re-purchasing the railway at once from Japan, expressed dissent. The Viceroy, of the Two Kiang is reported to have urged that such a measure would put money into Japan's hands for purposes of armament increase, but it is hard to believe that Chang Chih-tung advanced such an ill-considered argument.

The Kokumin's correspondent says that the Chinese journals of Peking and Tientsin advise the adoption of a sincere and liberal attitude towards Japan's proposals, and that several of them are now discussing the racial side of the situation, their view being that Japan and China are the representatives of the yellow peoples and that they should work in harmony.

The mixed committee which has been appointed to investigate the facts of the Lienchow outrage, arrived there on the 19th instant. Twenty-two arrests had been made before their coming. The district is said to be entirely calm.

Saturday, November 25.

The Hochi Shimbun's Peking correspondent wires in a very hopeful strain as to the result of the negotiations now in progress. He says that according to information obtained by him from officials who are in a position to speak, Chinese statesmen regard Japan's proposals as distinctly moderate, and are merely desirous that, as a point of magnanimity, she should endeavour as far as possible to save China's face. They further think that the opportunity should be seized to cement an alliance, if possible, between the two neighbouring empires; or if an alliance be out of the question, then that at least the two countries' relations should be placed on a much closer footing. Meanwhile the utmost secrecy is observed so as to deprive any third Power of opportunities to interfere. The Jiji Shimpō's correspondence also is couched in similarly hopeful terms. It says that the meeting—the second—on the 23rd lasted for three hours and resulted in disposing of one half of Japan's proposals favourably. The next meeting was to take place on the 24th. News from other quarters alleges that the Chinese have abandoned the idea of buying back the Manchurian Railway or of working it conjointly with the Japanese. All voices are not pleasant, however. The Russian vernacular organ in Peking is represented as contending that Japan really intends to establish herself in Manchuria on a footing similar to that now obtained by her in Korea, and that her purpose is distinctly aggressive. In connexion with this we find a strange telegram from the Kokumin Shimbun's Peking correspondent. He says that the Representatives of all the Powers—all without exception—are advising the Chinese Government to yield as little as possible to Japan and are supplying pretexts for obduracy. The Chinese journals, however, strongly deprecate such a policy and urge that the two empires must come together as defenders of Asia and that their wisest plan would be an alliance. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun's news confirms this synopsis of the Peking journalists' attitude, but does not say anything about the obstructions attributed to the Representatives of the Powers. Nor can the latter allegation be credited. Japan can count on the assistance of England at all events, and probably of the United States. No greater credit seems to belong to a version given by the correspondence of the Hochi Shimbun which says that M. Pokotiloff is leaving no stone unturned to throw obstacles in the path of a settlement between the two Empires, and is insisting that if the East Chinese Railway remain in Japanese hands, the so-called restoration of Manchuria to China will be a mere farce. How can M. Pokotiloff be advancing such an argument? Would it not plainly recoil upon his own country which built the line and held it until compelled by force to surrender it, and would it not involve the surrender of the Changchun-Harbin line also? The Hochi's correspondent further depicts the German Representative as opposing Japan's success, but the details of his opposition are not given.

On the whole we are inclined to think that the Tokyo journals are unintentionally misleading their public when they depict the progress of the negotiations in such hopeful terms. Negotiations with China have never been easy. She has never shown herself trustful. For that she is not to be blamed, perhaps, and especially in the present case she might be excused, for certainly she would not be the only Power in the world to distrust Japan's intentions. She ought to see that the choice lies now between Japan and England on one side and Russia on the other, but we are disposed to suspect that she will adhere, or seek to adhere, to her traditional policy of making no definite choice at all, and endeavouring to play off one Power against another. Rumour—not journalistic—attributes to her a singularly narrow-minded and unreasoning attitude towards the conference now going on, and we shall not be surprised to learn that Baron Komura's difficulties have assumed a formidable aspect.

Sunday, November 26.

On the 24th the third meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place and lasted until 7 p.m., the Japanese proposals being discussed in detail. Prince Ching was not present owing to illness. It is stated that the discussion proceeded very satisfactorily. The fourth meeting was to take place on the 25th. The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondence says that M. Pokotiloff has been making every possible effort to discover the details of the negotiations, but that he has failed completely, and has also, it is alleged, lost "face" with the other Legations in Peking. Rumour alleges that he has informed St. Petersburg telegraphically of the immediate imminence of a settlement between Japan and China. In the Jiji Shimpō's correspondence we find it stated that the Russian Government has recently been expressing a desire to open negotiations with China, and that they are likely to commence immediately after the conclusion of the negotiations between Japan and China, M. Pokotiloff acting as Russian Plenipotentiary.

It is stated (Jiji Shimpō's Shanghai correspondence) that a section of the Shanghai Chinese were to hold a meeting on the 26th instant for the purpose of discussing the political situation. The idea is that this step has been taken in consequence of an alarm created by the Russian organ of Shanghai, which has assiduously fomented the idea that the negotiations now proceeding in Peking between Japan and China involve serious perils for the latter Power.

In the Asahi Shimbun also it is confidently stated that the negotiations are proceeding satisfactorily and that they will probably be concluded in a few days. Japan's proposals number, not 12 as was originally stated, but only 11. China, it appears, has some proposals of her own to submit after the discussion of the Japanese terms has been concluded. Until these latter proposals are definitely formulated, it seems at least premature to assume that the negotiations will end satisfactorily.

The same paper repeats the rumour that China is very anxious to recover the East Chinese Railway, and that failing Japanese consent, she will propose joint ownership.

It is alleged that Mr. Tang, of Tibetan fame, who is one of the Chinese Plenipotentiaries, has expressed to the French Representative some very strong opinions about the pending negotiations and that his views are favourably regarded by the Chinese Authorities.

Several journals, headed by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, say that although the result of the present negotiations will be a convention whose terms and phraseology are such as to awaken no prejudices or antipathies, these will also be concluded by a treaty placing the relations of Japan and China on a much firmer footing than that on which they now stand. Whether any secret treaty is indicated by this intimation we can not tell. The statement is based on the authority of "general belief."

Mr. Uchida, acting under instructions from Tokyo, has agreed to accept the Chinese Government's proposal to supply 20 million catties of salt nominally as a gift to Japan.

Monday, November 27.

The fourth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 25th instant from 3 to 7 p.m. and the fifth meeting was to take place on the 26th. It is tolerably evident that much discussion is occurring and that the negotiations are not proceeding as smoothly as some correspondents have stated. From the Jiji Shimpō we learn that China has formulated certain demands, the principal of which are reduction of the evacuation period and of the number of railway guards. These proposals, it is said, have been put back for consideration after the Japanese terms have been dealt with. Plainly no other course presents itself, for Japan can not be expected to make any radical changes in the conditions of the Portsmouth Treaty unless Russia is a coöperating party, and so far as appearances indicate, it will tax Russia's capacity to remove her armies even in the time stipulated. Both Powers might indeed agree to reduce their railway guards if China gave some satisfactory guarantee that her own troops and police would materially assist to protect the line, but it is not easy to see immediately how any such guarantee can be furnished. All the Tokyo journals unite in representing the course of the negotiations as smooth and satisfactory, and all predict a speedy termination. In certain quarters, however, as we have already intimated, the Chinese Plenipotentiaries are believed to be formulating terms of a very singular character. One demand attributed to them is that the Japanese should give full compensation for all losses suffered by the non-combatant population of Manchuria during the war. Considering that China would have forfeited Manchuria altogether had not Japan intervened, a demand of this kind exposes the Peking Government to a charge of extreme unreason and ingratitude. Gratitude, we have to acknowledge, is one of the attributes which have altogether fallen out of the category of inter-state relations. Yet this is a case so flagrant that if the demeanour attributed to China be correct, she will forfeit another large part of the small residue she still possesses of the world's sympathy. Manchuria had become a Russian province when Japan stepped in. Nothing is more certain than that. Were Japan to demand from the Chinese a heavy contribution to defray her war expenditures, in consideration of restoring the three provinces to their original owner, she would only do as nine Western nations out of every ten would do under the circumstances, and as China herself would certainly do were the positions reversed. It is much to be hoped therefore that this rumour as to China's attitude may prove unfounded, but we must frankly say that we do not fully share the confidence displayed by our Tokyo contemporaries.

In the correspondence of Tokyo journals it is stated that the Chinese Court has ordered the organization of a Bureau of Administrative Investigation which is to have for object the construction of a new administrative system embodying the best features of Occidental governments. Men of ability are to be chosen for this bureau, and the only condition imposed is that the system elaborated by them shall be adapted to the circumstances of the Chinese nation. Whether the bureau is to be a mere make-believe, or whether it will prove a genuine instrument of progress, depends largely on the composition of its personnel. China has many subjects who have fully studied foreign systems in theory and in practice, and who may be assumed to be competent to make intelligent selections among the material presenting itself. If such men be appointed and if the Court be earnestly bent upon giving effect to their recommendations, this new step may mean a great deal. But the truth is that the machinery of administration in China does not stand in such pressing need of reform. Many people imagine that the administrative system elaborated by Japan at the Restoration in 1867 was borrowed from European models. Such was not the case. The fact is that Japan simply went back to the old lines of the seventh century which, in their turn, had been borrowed from China. The system of boards and bureaux existing in the Middle Kingdom dates from days when China was incomparably the most highly civilized country in the world, and the administrative wisdom of those days is not at all to be despised. To outsiders what seems to be chiefly wanting in China is the abolition of the present method of farming offices. The high posts are now virtually farmed out. Their holders receive salaries flagrantly inadequate to the functions they have to perform, the theory being that they collect from the people enough to make up the difference as well as to provide for large payments of a more so less clandestine nature to the central Government, and to compensate themselves for the immense responsibilities they are required to accept, every one of these leading officials being subject to the severest punishment should his administration be marked by mishap or catastrophe. It is an intelligent and intelligible system, not ill-adapted to the requirements of such a vast nation. But it has failed on trial—a trial extending over many centuries—its main defect being that it offers temptations which human nature, taken in the bulk, is not capable of resisting. It is thus that Chinese officialdom has acquired the reputation of being the most corrupt in the world, and though the criticism is founded to some extent on defective understanding, it has also much truth. The most obvious reform needed is, not re-manufacture of the administrative mechanism, but a total change in the method of office-holding; a change in the sense of giving ample salaries to officials and making it fraudulent on their part to extort another cent from the people. The whole web of parasitic finance which now holds officialdom in its meshes would ultimately be cleared away could that change be successfully made.

An imperial decree just published in Peking suggests that the Court is perturbed by evidences of disaffection throughout the Empire. The decree says that insurrectionary movements are apparent here and there and that false teachers are misleading the people by enunciation of unquiet doctrines. All local satraps and their juniors are therefore called on to exercise the utmost vigilance in restraining such persons and punishing in the severest manner such ebullitions. The issue of this decree is by some observers attributed to the fact that the interrupted journey of the five envoys of enquiry is on the eve of resumption. The journey was suspended on account of the bomb thrown by a man who still remains unidentified, and the Court deems this decree a necessary precaution. That is a theory which seems lacking in sense of proportion. At the same time the bomb-throwing incident must be called one of the most mysterious events on record. It also furnishes almost incredible evidence of police incompetence. The thrower's corpse still awaits recognition. It is carefully preserved and we must assume that, during the many days which have elapsed since the perpetration of the outrage, most diligent attempts have been made to identify the body of the perpetrator. Yet it lies unnamed, a striking testimony to the powerlessness of officialdom and a constant reminder that the organization responsible for the attempt—if there was an organization—is as powerful for mischief as ever. The Court may well feel perturbed in the presence of such conditions.

In the North-China Daily News we find a strong article denouncing the Chinese Government's adoption of an exclusive policy in the matter of mines and railways. Our contemporary says that "the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance having relieved China of all anxiety for the future, she considers it no longer necessary to conciliate foreign Powers by granting them concessions." This policy the Shanghai journal calls "suicidal and antiquated," and we have heard a hope expressed in other quarters that Japan will exert her newly augmented influence to prise China out of a groove so unpractical. Certainly it can not be denied that the day has long passed since China or any other east-Asian Power can retire within its shell and live hidden from the world. Yet we find it hard not to sympathise with the Chinese in this particular matter of mines and railways. We ask ourselves, "Would any sane Power with China's experiences continue to grant railway concessions to foreigners?" The railway has been proved to be an instrument of aggression. It has taken the place of that euphemistic pretext, a sphere of influence. A foreign State—it would be easy to particularize but we refrain from doing so—which obtains a railway concession in China, regards itself as having acquired a kind of right in the territory through which the line runs, and takes no notice of any protest on China's part. Why should the Peking Government deliberately create fresh points of friction by granting concessions? Yet as the Shanghai journal justly says, railways have got to be built. There is on that subject a species of unwritten law which no Power can ignore. The question then is, "how?"

Tuesday, November 28.

It is remarkable to observe the silence preserved in Peking with regard to the details of the negotiations now in progress. Not a solitary fact has leaked out. This is in marked contrast with the record during the Portsmouth Conference when, in defiance, it is said, of a distinct agreement, the Russians took the journalists into their confidence and the result was that all the world became a spectator at the proceedings. The Chinese, too, have never hitherto shown any faculty of secrecy in such matters. Foreign correspondents or foreign diplomats whose business it was to discover what was going on, did not find any insuperable difficulty in doing so, and it came to be a saying that Chinese official archives were in effect a circulating library for all who did not shrink from paying high fees. But on this occasion of a conference between China and Japan absolute privacy has been obtained. Rumour attributes this result to precautions taken by Viceroy Yuan. That is not unlikely, but one can easily understand that even the most "leaky" Chinese official must see the advantage of not admitting outside nations to the council chamber in this case. We shall probably hear some talk by and bye about the attitude of jealous secrecy maintained by the Yellow Race towards white eavesdroppers, but inasmuch as the most enlightened nations of the Occident desire nothing less than a serious misunderstanding between Japan and China, and inasmuch as privacy plainly assists to avert that calamity, such criticisms will fall innocuous.

Meanwhile the conference, as we have more than once ventured to predict, shows signs of obvious retardation. The fifth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 26th and lasted from 3 p.m. until 8 p.m., without leading to any definite result. Japanese journals now begin to use the ominous term yukinayami in connexion with the negotiations, and a majority of them predict that the middle of December will barely suffice to bring the conference to a close. It will be found, we anticipate, that the task which Baron Komura had to discharge in Peking was more onerous than that which gave so much trouble in Portsmouth. The Chinese seem to be under the unhappy influence of some hallucination. They have temporarily lost their ability to recognise the value of a friend and preserver, which incompetence is the more wonderful seeing how very few are now the States that can be classed in such a category.

The leading Chinese in Shanghai held a meeting on the 26th instant for the purpose of debating the Manchurian question. They are reported to have displayed no hostility whatever towards Japan, but they adopted a resolution that the sovereignty of Manchuria must be preserved by all means for China, and they conveyed that expression of opinion to the Peking Government. Of course one must sympathise with the anxiety of every loyal Chinese subject to preserve the integrity of the Empire, but it would be more in accord with the principles of justice if the part taken by Japan in preserving that integrity were frankly acknowledged. The only extenuating feature of China's attitude at the present moment is her conviction that whatever agreement she makes as to Japan's status in the regions south of Changchun, a similar agreement must be made in the case of Russia northward of that place. There is certainly one radical difference, namely, that no Liaotung exists in the north. Apart from that, however, it is evident that if the Changchun-Liaotung Railway be made a pretext for mining concessions and guards in the southern section of the Three Provinces, the Changchun-Harbin line will constitute a similar pretext in the northern section. The negotiation is thus complicated, but as both of the contracting parties are anxious to loosen Russia's foothold in Manchuria, some satisfactory arrangement should be possible.

The Five Envoys are expected to travel from Peking to Shanghai by rail and their arrival at Nagasaki will take place about the 7th December. Their staff is large: it numbers some fifty persons.

Wednesday, November 29.

The sixth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries was to be held on the 28th, the 27th having been a day of rest. Peking seems to be much exercised by the secrecy successfully observed in all matters relating to the conference. Meanwhile rumours are beginning to circulate that Japan is making many concessions and that the affair will ultimately resemble the Portsmouth conference. But some correspondents allege that the discussion is proceeding most amicably. The Hochi's correspondent says that the Japanese demands have been found so moderate that 5 articles out of the 12 (?) have already been settled, and the Asahi's correspondent mentions several points which have been solved. But these reports are scarcely worthy of full credit. It would seem that the negotiations on the Chinese side have been conducted and directed chiefly by Viceroy Yuan.

M. Pokotiloff is said to have become very active. He is going about from one influential Chinese to another, advising them that if they make any special concessions to Japan in Manchuria, other Powers will demand equal privileges elsewhere and thus the partition of China will be inaugurated, M. Pokotiloff, if such be really his attitude, seems to forget that a very great power is pledged not to permit the partition of China.

Without vouching for the truth of any of the statements wired from Peking as to the course of the conference, we may nevertheless set them down as matters of great interest. First, it is alleged that Japan asked for a longer lease of Liaotung than Russia possessed, and that Viceroy Yuan contended for the same time. How this was settled we are not told. Secondly, the articles relating to the withdrawal of the troops and the lease of Liaotung as well as three other articles are said to have been disposed of. Thirdly, the great question believed to be occupying the conference is that of granting special commercial privileges as well as the control of the customs to Japan in Manchuria. Fourthly, the concession for a Kirin-Changchun railway is alleged to have been granted without difficulty, but in order to obtain a concession for the Wiju-Mukden line, it was found necessary to abandon the request for a Mukden-Hsinmintun concession.

It is rumoured that in accordance with the advice of Baron Komura, China will greatly increase her garrisons at Kirin and in the Amur region.

The President of the United States is said to have informed Mr. Na Tung, through the Peking Legation, that he purposes asking Congress to return to China the sum of 20 million dollars paid by the latter in connexion with the Boxer outrages, but he feared that the boycott of American goods might influence Congress to reject the project. Mr. Na replied that his Government had made several attempts to put an end to the boycott; that nothing was more earnestly desired than the best relations with the United States; that the number of Chinese subjects desiring to proceed to America was constantly increasing and that the situation might find its best solution in some mitigation of the immigration laws of the United States.

Thursday, November 30.

There is no news to-day as to the progress of the negotiations in Peking. Japanese newspapers re-publish an alleged version of the proposals presented by Baron Komura. They are said to have appeared originally in a Peking newspaper, but as it is obvious that little credit attaches to such a source, we refrain from printing them here. Evidently the delay that is taking place can not be construed in a sense very favourable to the success of Japan's proposals. The Jiji Shinpo hints that many concessions have been made by the Japanese Plenipotentiaries, but it is not difficult to perceive that our contemporary speaks mainly from conjecture. The Jiji, from the moment of its remarkable "break" in connexion with the Portsmouth Treaty, seems wedded to the view that no diplomatic success can be achieved by the present Cabinet. We would point out, however, that the Chinese are people who can not always be relied on to show themselves amenable to diplomacy as usually practised.

The Nanfangpao, of Shanghai on November 21st referring to the Manchuria negotiations said:—"For playing the part of a friend in this nominal return of China's territory to China, Japan naturally expects to be reimbursed, and so long as the reimbursement does not infringe upon our sovereign rights, the Chinese people should gladly and willingly exhibit their gratitude in substantial form. Therefore, in the settlement, the Chinese Plenipotentiaries should constantly keep in mind that while we should concede to our island neighbours certain privileges, these should not be of a nature to impair our national rights. Otherwise, the fate of Manchuria would be no less doomed than before,—there would be only a transference of masters, Japanese instead of Russian."

Viceroy Chang Chih-tung has nearly completed a volume defending his action in the matter of buying back the Canton-Hankow railway concession by the aid of a British loan.

A censor has memorialised the Chinese Throne praying that "men old in age and experience be appointed as State Ministers, as a preliminary step towards the cleansing of the Augean stables of officialdom, and as a check and warning to those upstarts who pretend to be progressive."

The Sunwenpao publishes a telegram from Hangchow, dated the 20th November, in which it is stated that a Roman Catholic Church in Tient'aihsien, prefecture of Taichou, has been burned down and destroyed by a mob, consisting of the followers of the notorious Wang Hsi-tung. This man, says the writer of Native Notes in the North China Daily News, is an outlawed member of the Taichou gentry and a determined enemy of the Roman Catholic Church in Chekiang province.

A Peking despatch states that a Belgian mining engineer who is in the service of H. E. Sheng Yun, Viceroy of Shen-Kan provinces, is now in the capital conferring with the Waiwpu and Shangpu with reference to the opening of certain valuable mineral deposits in the two provinces. It is also stated that matters relating to the proposed Railway between Lanchow (Capital of Kansu province) and Kuldja (Capital of Ili province, or North-western Chinese Turkestan) are progressing so far that Tls. 600,000 has already been collected or guaranteed by the projectors of the Railway and that work on a portion of the road bed will begin early next spring.

H. E. Chao Erh-shun, the Viceroy at Mukden, has asked for and received permission from the throne to raise funds by the sale of official rank and posts, a step which the P. and T. Times earnestly deprecates, seeing that trained and experienced officials are badly wanted in Manchuria at the present time.

A letter from Chengtu, capital of Szechuan province, states that the two Taotais, Chao and Ts'ien, who were sent last summer at the head of some troops to Pat'ang, Tibet, to suppress the rising there and punish the murders of the late Assistant Resident of Tibet, Feng Ch'uan, have now returned to Chengtu, and in response to their suggestion H. E. Hsi Liang, Viceroy of Szechuan, has memorialised the Throne asking that Pat'ang be organised into a hsien and placed under a chihhsien, or district magistrate, who is to be assisted by a police magistrate, or hsunchien. Should this be approved by the Throne, Inner Pat'ang, or Lit'ang, will also be organised under similar lines. This confirms our news of the other day that there is no likelihood of another province being created on the present Szechuan-Tibetan borders.

The report of the Hongkong Dairy Farm Co., Ltd., for the year ended 31st July last, shows a divisible balance of $57,864, on a paid-up capital of $150,000 (of which only $60,000 was actually paid in cash). The directors propose to pay a dividend of $1.20 per share or 20 per cent., put $25,000 to cattle reserve and carry forward $2,864.

What would appear to be a daring robbery took place on Saturday morning in the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, says the Daily Press of November 20th. The details of the occurrence have not been allowed to become public property, but so far as can be gathered a shroff from a native bank went to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank to deposit a sum of $20,000. He had counted out a considerable sum, about $10,000, when the receiving shroff bent down to pick up something from the ground. When he resumed his original position, he found that the notes counted out had disappeared. It is said that a protracted search failed to reveal the whereabouts of the money.

There was a large attendance at the Royal Asiatic Society's Hall on November 22nd, says the N. C. Daily News, to hear a paper by Dr. W. A. P. Martin on the Jewish Monument at Kaifengfu. The larger portion of the audience was composed of members of the Jewish community, to whom the subject was of special interest. As Dr. Martin is at present in America his paper was read by Dr. J. C. Ferguson. The paper dealt with a monument at Kaifengfu, rubbings of both sides of which were presented to the Royal Asiatic Society by Dr. Martin. One side of the monument was devoted to an exposition of the Jewish religion, so far as it was known to the Jewish settlement. The other side bore an account of the entry of the Jews into China, etc. The paper was exceedingly lucid and interesting and was heartily applauded. An informal discussion took place afterwards, in the course of which it transpired that six of the Kaifengfu Jews are at present in Shanghai, being cared for by the Jewish community. They are being taught Hebrew and also receiving a thorough education.

It is understood, says the Nanfangpao, that Mr. Ku Hung-ming will receive a post on the Huangpu Conservancy.

We are informed, says a Shanghai exchange, that the Customs have succeeded in detecting a Shanghai foreign firm in endeavouring to pass Italians, the duty on which is 24 candareens, a piece, as sheetings for which the duty is 7 candareens. It is hoped that this detection will discourage this form of defrauding the Customs, all foreign firms, as well as the Chinese revenue, being injured by practices of this kind, of which the one now detected is not, we fear, an isolated instance.

A large Chinese dog, presumed to be mad, ran amuck in Shanghai on the 22nd. It bit two native constables but was at length killed by Chinese coolies who beat it with bamboos while a Sikh constable held its dead down into his cape.

The funeral of the late Capt. Deimling, of the German gunboat Tiger, who died at the Shanghai General Hospital on Nov. 20th of appendicitis, took place on Nov. 22nd amidst general manifestations of mourning, all the Consulates and men-of-war in harbour having their flags half-masted.

The prefect concerned in the Lienchou murders has submitted a report which agrees with the statement that it was Dr. Machle's objection to the firing of bombs near his hospital which commenced the trouble. The prefect takes on himself the blame for not taking the necessary precautions against the possibility of such a riot, but says that there might not have been so many missionaries killed had they listened to his advice, and instead of fleeing with the Chinese converts had taken boats or chairs and sought refuge in the city.

The survey for the proposed Peking-Kalgan line has been completed; the line is to be constructed in three sections, and the total cost is estimated at Tls. 7,291,800.

A STORY BY MR. STORY.

Mr. Douglas Story has published a book called "The Campaign with Kuropatkin." We have not had an opportunity of reading the work, but in the Review of Reviews we find the following reference to it by Mr. W. T. Stead:—"I mention it here to call special attention to its photographs, and also because he distinctly recognises that the Russians began the war in a spirit of leisurely humanity, which was not quickened to savagery until the Japanese had convinced them they were fighting with a savage barbarity which gave no quarter and took no prisoners, or next to none. Mr. Story also lays great stress upon the old-fashioned equipment of the Russians, their distrust of heliographs, etc." This is worthy of their attention who charge the Japanese nation with lack of veracity as compared with Occidental peoples. The very first slaughter of wounded and mutilation of dead took place on the eve of the very first battle fought, the Battle of the Yalu, and the slaughterers and mutilators were Russians, their victims Japanese. If then the Russians were "quickened into savagery" the quickening motive must have been present, for it was they that began the brutality. It will be observed, too, that if Mr. Stead's analysis be correct, Mr. Story distinctly admits that the Russians were guilty of savagery. He does not attempt to deny the fact but he seeks to ascribe this brutality to a spirit of revenge. It will further be observed that Mr. W. T. Stead by implication endorses Mr. Douglas Story's accusation against the Japanese. His use of the word "recognises" is conclusive. Mr. Story, we are told, "distinctly recognises that the Russians began the war in a spirit of leisurely humanity which was not quickened to savagery until the Japanese had convinced them that they were fighting with a savage barbarity which gave no quarter and took no prisoners or next to none." Mr. Stead is too well versed in the use of the English language not to be aware that any reader of the above passage must interpret him as endorsing the author's version. Mr. Stead has been guilty of abundant injustices since he became a publicist. A writer who knows no via media but deals always in extremes must necessarily be guilty of injustices. This, however, is probably the most flagrant injustice ever perpetrated by him. And what augments its enormity is the fact that it was committed after the conclusion of the war, when the whole truth was accessible. To talk at that epoch of the Japanese taking "no prisoners or next to none," when they actually had in their hands seventy-two thousand prisoners against less than two thousand held by the Russians, is quite reckless. We do not believe in perpetuating a charge of savagery against the Russians; still less in any attempts to justify their acts of savagery. It is far more agreeable and probably much more truthful to accept the verdicts of writers like Lord Brooke and Mr. Maurice Baring who tell us that the Russian private, in nine cases out of every ten, is a capital fellow, good-tempered, patient under terrible trials and withal kindly, while of his splendid valour there can be no manner of doubt considering how tenaciously he fought in the face of disaster after disaster. But, whether the sin is to be laid at the door of the Cossacks, of the Siberian levies, or of the European troops, undoubtedly there were among the Russians some for whose conduct their comrades might well blush, as we do when we find an English publicist like Mr. W. T. Stead attempting to whitewash the miscreants in the Russian camp by attacking the reputation for humanity which all the world has agreed to accord to the Japanese.

THE PRISONERS.

Admirals Rojestvensky and Wiren and thirteen of their staff left Nagasaki on the 23rd instant by the torpedo-depot ship Yakudo.

General Daniloff having conducted an investigation into the circumstances of the mutiny or board the Borodino, found that there had been 26—some accounts say 23—ring-leaders. These were sent ashore and placed in confinement. The remaining ex-prisoners, 3,487 in all, were transferred to the Volunteer S.S. Kieff and sent to Vladivostock.

The General is represented as saying that there will be no interruption of the programme for sending the prisoners to Vladivostock. He understands that the emute there was only a temporary affair and that order has now been restored. The arrangements for the reception of the prisoners are still available and he has not received from the Commandant any request to abstain from sending on the men. This sounds somewhat strange. If we may credit it, the Russian General appears to be relying on negative evidence. One can not easily suppose that the absence of a request not to send on the prisoners is construed as a sufficient reason for sending them, in view of the shocking disturbances which have certainly occurred at the place of their destination. In the Jiji Shimpō we read that the mutinous condition of the men on board the Borodino was such that a soldier refused to give his name when asked to do so by Admiral Rojestvensky himself, and that the men threw overboard a quantity of clothing just supplied to them, this act of defiance being performed in the presence of the officers. The despatch of sixty or seventy thousand troops among whom such a spirit prevails to Vladivostock where a mutiny on a very large scale has already occurred seems extremely reckless.

Colonel Oi, Military Attaché of the Japanese Legation in Berlin, telegraphs under date of the 25th instant that 1,718 Japanese, who had been held prisoners in Russia, have all been handed over by Russia at the frontier. On the 18th instant they embarked at Hamburg in a steamer bound for Kobe, where they will probably arrive about the middle of February. Among these prisoners are Colonel Murakami and Major Togo.

There are said to be still 230 Japanese prisoners in Manchuria.

The number of prisoners handed over to the Russians up to the 28th instant was 16,527, including 399 officers. Inasmuch as the total number in the hands of the Japanese was originally 71,937, it will be seen that there still remain 55,410.

Our readers are already aware that Admiral Rojestvensky, on the occasion of recovering his liberty, addressed to the Japanese authorities a warm letter of thanks for the kindly treatment extended to him and his officers during their stay in Japanese hospitals. General Daniloff, who is directing the return of the prisoners, has also sent a letter of acknowledgement. He speaks in the highest terms not only of the treatment accorded to the Russian prisoners throughout the period of their detention in Japan, but also of the arrangements made for handing them over. Japan's conduct towards the prisoners, he says, is the best practical proof of the genuinely friendly character of the relations now restored between the two empires, and it will be a great honour to him to report these facts to his Government.

The second departure of Russians took place on Nov. 28th or 27th from Yokohama on the Volunteer ship Verona. On Monday, 677 men arrived in Yokohama from Narashino; 21 officers and 596 from Takasaki; and 36 officers and 640 men from Sendai. On Tuesday, 677 men also arrived in Yokohama from Narashino. The following will shortly embark from Kobe for home: On Nov. 26th, five officers and 590 men from Kyoto. On the 27th, 53 officers and 1,720 will be brought thither from Nagoya, and 630 men from Kanazawa. On the following day, 720 men will be brought from Nagoya; 40 officers and 640 men from Toyohashi; and 400 men from Kanazawa.

Major-General Irman, one of the ex-commanders of Port Arthur has arrived in Kobe from Nagoya. He will shortly leave by a German or French mail steamer for home.

Lieut.-General Daniloff, the Russian commissioner to take delivery of the prisoners, and his wife arrived in Kobe from Nagasaki on their way to Tokyo. The general proceeded to Nagasaki after the reported disturbance among the blue-jackets and soldiers on the three transports. There he met his wife who had just arrived from Vladivostock with the wife of Major-General Essen and other ladies.

On Nov. 25th, 31 officers including a Major-General, and 202 non-commissioned officers and men left Matsuyama by the Russian hospital ship Mongolia for Vladivostock via Nagasaki.

KOREA.

Friday, November 24.

Naturally Marquis Ito is overwhelmed with telegrams of condolence. The Imperial Princes, all the Foreign Representatives and all the Ministers of State as well as the Committee of the Seiyu-kai have sent messages. Lady MacDonald had the graceful thought of telegraphing to Marquioness Ito at Oiso. The Koreans are reported to be much alarmed. The Emperor sent to inquire for him at 2 a.m., and the same morning a representative of the Cabinet called. The Marquis is stated to be none the worse. He slept soundly and shows no signs of injury except that his face is somewhat disfigured by bits of court-plaster. In reply to the Emperor's message he said that no importance need be attached to an act evidently perpetrated by mere roughs. The Jiji Shimpō, however, writes very strongly on the subject. The gist of its argument is that although the consequences of the outrage were insignificant, there can be no mistaking the spirit that inspired it. It is the same spirit that led the Premier, Han Kyu-kwa, to set himself in opposition to the Japanese proposals in spite of his sovereign's declared assent to them, and it is the spirit which inspired the attempt to burn the house of the Minister of Education, Li Won-yong. If such things be condoned on the very eve of Japan's assumption of a protectorate, a very troublesome situation may arise. The Koreans have not shown any capacity for discriminating between clemency and weakness. The Hochi Shimbun thinks that the outrage may be traced to the attitude of the Minister of Justice, Li Hwa-yong, formerly Korean Representative in Japan. He had originally been in sympathy with the idea of placing his country under Japanese protection, but when he saw the proposals formulated by Mr. Hayashi, he suddenly veered round and became vehemently obstructive. It is confidently believed that he incited the literati, of whom he is an acknowledged head, to set fire to the house of Li Won-yong.

A Japanese Imperial Ordinance No. 245, issued on the 23rd instant, orders the establishment of a Resident General (To-kan) in Seoul, and of Residents (Riji-cho) in Seoul, Chemulpo, Fusan, Gensan, Chinampo, Mokpo, Masampo, and such other places as may be considered necessary. For the present, the Japanese Legation in Seoul, will serve as the office and dwelling of the Resident General, and the Consulates will similarly serve for the Residents.

The Imperial Message to Mr. Hayashi recognises the sincerity and ability shown by him in bringing his duties to a successful issue. Mr. Hayashi, in his reply, attributes the happy result to His Majesty's powerful influence.

Mr. Min Yong-chol has declined to assume the premier's portfolio in succession to Mr. Han, and the post has been given to Pak Che-soon, Minister of Foreign Affairs. Up to the 22nd the Ministers with one accord abstained from attending their offices. This Cabinet strike commenced on the 18th, the day of the signature of the new Convention. The Emperor finally issued a peremptory order that the Ministers must attend on the 23rd. It seems childish that they should assume this recalcitrant attitude. Had they persisted in refusing to be parties to the Convention their action would have been intelligible and consistent, but to give their consent and then to abstain from discharging their functions appears unreasonable.

The Jiji Shimpō recalls the leading incidents of the career of the Emperor of Korea. His Majesty has been perpetually in trouble ever since he ascended the Throne. His embarrassments began at the hands of his own father, the Tai Won-kun, whose quarrel with the Queen led finally to the latter's assassination and to the arrest and transportation of the Tai Won-kun himself. Moreover, the Emperor has seen his palace besieged and his own person threatened, and has been obliged to take refuge in a foreign legation. Apart from these disquieting incidents of his chequered existence, his constant occupation seems to have been to hold the balance of power between rival cliques of aspirants for office. He has never exercised sovereign authority in the true sense of the word nor ever enjoyed a genuine sense of security. Things will be very different now that Japan guarantees "the welfare and dignity" of the Imperial House. His Majesty will enjoy real safety and the growing prosperity of the country will give him a steadily increasing revenue. As to the latter point, indeed, he may rest assured that Japan will never see him reduced to a condition inconsistent with the maintenance of the "dignity" mentioned in the convention.

Saturday, November 25.

It is stated that on examination of the four persons arrested in connexion with the stone-throwing affair, the actual perpetrator has been found to be a farmer, who, being under the influence of drink, thought it a pleasant pastime to hurl a bit of rock at a moving object. Another account says that the guilty person was a Korean employee of a Japanese resident. His idea—also stated to have been inspired by drink—was to place a stone on the rails, but being restrained by his comrades, he contented himself with hurling the projectile. At all events the affair does not have any political complexion whatever.

The Korean Authorities, from the Emperor downwards, are said to have shown much solicitude, but Marquis Ito sent Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku to the Palace to point out that the affair was a mere mischievous freak not possessing any importance whatever. Some disposition having been shown by the Koreans to punish the offender severely, Marquis Ito is said to have asked that he be pardoned.

On the 24th Marquis Ito gave a banquet to the members of the Korean Cabinet and other high personages.

In the Shugyo Shimpō, however, we find it stated that up to the 24th the Korean Ministers, fearing the populace, had not resumed their attendance at their offices. Moreover the Jiji's correspondence alleges that the Chinese merchants at Chemulpo have secretly pledged themselves not to do any business with the Japanese. It is probable that things are not as quiet in Korea as some accounts suggest.

Sunday, November 26.

Marquis Ito is expected to leave Seoul on the 28th instant for Japan. His proposed visit to Pyong-yang has been abandoned, it is said.

The Korean Government has removed from office the Governor of the district where the stone-throwing occurred. This step, we need scarcely say, is designed by way of apology to Marquis Ito. There can be no pretence of justice set up on its behalf.

Marquis Ito was to deliver a speech on the evening of the 24th instant at the residence of Miss Sontag.

Mr. Chyo Pyong-sik is said to have presented to the Emperor a document impeaching the present Cabinet for its share in concluding the new Convention, but the Emperor returned the document advising Mr. Chyo to consider the position more carefully. Mr. Chyo is not alone in this protest. Others, though of lesser political standing, are said to have made similar representations to the Throne but without any success.

A characteristic trait is described of Marquis Ito. There is in the enclosure of the compound occupied by the Head Quarter Staff a rock, apparently of large dimensions. Upon this the Marquis has written with his own hands and in conspicuous ideographs Hōso no kan-ō tenjō to mukyu (Heaven accords to the Throne the stability of the universe). The rock is to be removed from its present site and placed in a situation less open to elemental ravages. Great satisfaction is said to have been inspired among the Koreans by this act, but it is possible that the inscription might be construed in a somewhat equivocal manner. Doubtless the present occupant of the Korean Throne is pleased, and with him his loyal subjects, which, after all, is the object Marquis Ito had in view.

The Russian organs of Shanghai, English and Chinese, publish a remarkable story which indicates that they have very small respect for public discernment. The gist of the tale is this:—On the 17th instant the Japanese Minister submitted to the Emperor of Korea a Convention embodying conditions totally destructive of the country's sovereignty. The Sovereign and his Ministers obstinately refused to sign such a document. Then Mr. Hayashi, finding that all resources of persuasion and argument were unavailing, solicited the assistance of Marquis Ito, who, in spite of the lateness of the hour, repaired to the Palace, in company with General Hasegawa and escorted by a large body of troops. Even in the presence of this military menace the patriotic Koreans refused to yield and then the Japanese resorted to their final expedient. They sent a detachment of gendarmes accompanied by Mr. Numano, secretary of Mr. D. W. Stevens, to the residence of the Minister of Foreign Affairs and there took violent possession of the State Seal which they carried to the Palace, and stamped the objectionable document in the presence of the Emperor and his Ministers, declaring that the Convention must now be regarded as duly signed. The pro-Russian journals add that the Japanese have taken military possession of the Palace and all its approaches, and that the Emperor may have ultimately to yield to this intimidation. We sometimes wonder whether Bishop Awdry and critics who share his views as to Japanese indifference for truth, ever take the trouble to compile a catalogue showing the fine acts of veracity which tend to the credit of foreigners.

Monday, November 27.

The banquet given by Marquis Ito in Seoul on the 26th instant is reported to have been an affair of unprecedented magnitude. Six hundred persons are said to have been present, but it is difficult to conceive that the Korean capital's resources can have sufficed for such an entertainment in Western style and possibly the banquet may have been confounded with a subsequent reception. At all events there was a signal fete. The Korean Ministers of State were present, and every one of note in Seoul is said to have been included. Marquis Ito proposed the health of the Emperor of Korea, and the Korean Minister of Foreign Affairs proposed that of the Emperor of Japan. It is plain that the Korean officials have become reconciled to the new situation since they are celebrating it by dining and winning.

The United States Secretary of State is telegraphically reported to have intimated to Mr. Takahira that the American Legation in Seoul will be closed.

On the 25th instant, Marquis Ito gave a reception at the Head-Quarter Staff's premises. Seven hundred were present and the affair is described as very brilliant.

The Korean who threw a stone at the train by which Marquis Ito was travelling has been sentenced to 2 months' imprisonment and a hundred blows of the bamboo.

Tuesday, November 28.

It had been announced that Marquis Ito would be received in farewell audience by the Emperor of Korea on the 28th instant, but His Majesty having expressed an earnest desire for a more prolonged stay on the part of the Japanese statesman, Marquis Ito is said to have telegraphed to the Mikado for Instructions.

There has been the usual bestowal of orders and decorations in connexion with the visit of the Marquis to the Korean capital.

The Japanese inhabitants of Seoul and Chemulpo entertained Marquis Ito at a Japanese hotel in Seoul on the 27th instant, to celebrate the conclusion of the new convention.

It has been officially announced that the United States Legation in Seoul will be withdrawn. The German Minister also has been instructed to return to Berlin, and this is regarded as preliminary to closing the Legation.

Wednesday, November 29.

Readers of a newspaper published in Seoul under the title of the Korea Daily News must have observed that ever since it came into existence its hostility to the Japanese has been of the most marked and inveterate description. The editor is a man entirely lacking any qualification to speak with authority about either Korea or Japan, and in the absence of competence he has fallen back upon assurance. It was to have been expected that a journal so plainly prejudiced would find something injurious to say against the Japanese in connexion with the recently concluded Convention, and the expectation has been fulfilled. The Korea Daily News actually goes the length of alleging that the seal of the Korean Foreign Office was forcibly taken by the Japanese from that office and was affixed to the convention by some one other than the Korean Minister of Foreign Affairs, the obvious intention being to suggest that the whole affair was a fraud; and that the Convention, so far from being legally concluded and duly signed, was dictated by Japan and signed by the Japanese not alone in their own name but in the name of the Koreans also, the latter not being consenting parties. We do not expect to find a journal like the Korea Daily News exhibit any sense of responsibility. Its desperate and disingenuous attempts to discredit Japan had prepared us to see it resort to any extreme in this final hour. But we are somewhat surprised by the spirit in which the daily German newspaper of Yokohama greets the canards of the Seoul journal. The former newspaper says:—"If the statement made is correct—and we presume it would not be made if it were not correct—the methods adopted to obtain the consent of Korea to Japan's demands do not reflect much credit on those responsible for them, and we can not believe that Great Britain, the ally of Japan, whose reputation in this connection is also at stake, will acquiesce in such proceedings." A more extravagant doctrine was never enunciated. "We presume the statement would not be made if it were not correct." According to this reasoning there can be no such thing as a falsehood, for the truth of a statement is established by the mere fact of its being made! Only the profoundest prejudice, the most absorbing desire to believe the worst, could betray a publicist into such a proposition. Scarcely less monstrous is the Japan Herald's contention, advanced in a later part of the same article, that "if these reports are allowed to pass unnoticed * * * there will ultimately be a reaction in the popular feeling towards Japan by the people of England." It would follow then, that a Government is bound to take notice of every report, however improbable in itself and however insignificant its origin, and that, failing such notice, the report must be held worthy of general credence—an extravagant and impractical doctrine. In this instance we have a story circulated by an altogether obscure newspaper, and it is a story which offers a gross insult to Marquis Ito, Mr. Hayashi and all the Japanese officials in Korea. It accuses them of deliberately contriving and consummating a transaction not only forcefully subversive of a neighbouring empire's rights but also palpably fraudulent, since to purloin a State seal and affix it by vis major to a document pledging the rightful owners of the seal to certain conditions which in reality they repudiate, would obviously be an act of tyranny and a criminal forgery. Such, nevertheless, is the act which the Korea Daily News deliberately lays to the charge of Marquis Ito and such is the accusation which the Japan Herald "presumes to be correct or it would not be made." The reputation of Marquis Ito ought to have guaranteed him against such villainous scandals, and would have guaranteed him with all publicists of ordinary intelligence and discrimination.

Marquis Ito has made an address to the various newspaper editors in Seoul, whom His Excellency invited to luncheon for the purpose. He is reported to have said:—"It is most desirable that newspaper editors, in conveying information about Korean affairs to Japan, should exercise the utmost caution so as to avoid misleading the Japanese people. Some people in Japan seem to imagine that the new convention has placed Korea in the hollow of Japan's hand and has virtually contrived the overthrow of the empire. Such a view is as precipitate as that referred to in the Chinese proverb where the egg is mistaken for the crow of the full grown cock. It is true that Japan has assumed the charge of Korea's foreign affairs, but on the other hand, the Emperor of Japan has sent his special ambassador to convey to the Korean Court a solemn assurance of the preservation of its safety and prestige. That is a point of the greatest importance. Further it need scarcely be stated that the machinery of administration remains as before under the control and direction of His Majesty the Emperor. At a moment of such changes the Koreans themselves were likely to fall into greater errors than the Japanese. Therefore the policy to be hereafter pursued towards Korea would be informed by the utmost sincerity of act and intention. She would be assisted and led along the paths of gradual progress, and everything savouring of precipitate pressure would be avoided. When I had the honour of being received by His Majesty the Emperor of Korea with reference to the terms of the new Treaty, His Majesty expressed and seemed profoundly moved by the fact that even in the days when Korea used the Chinese almanack and was in effect a tributary of China, she nevertheless retained the control of her own foreign affairs, whereas now in the reign of His Majesty after his dynasty had continued for 500 years, he was asked to sign a Convention which would destroy his Empire and render him guilty in the sight of his ancestors. I accordingly sought to resolve His Majesty's doubts by pointing out in the utmost detail that the vicissitudes of the time rendered this inevitable, and that so soon as Korea's development had become assured it was the earnest desire of the Japanese Government to restore to her forthwith the direction of her own foreign affairs. When the time came for signing the Convention, the Prime Minister, Mr. Han Kyuhwa, sobbed with emotion and seemed wholly overcome. These things render it imperative that Japan, being the pioneer in progress, should behave towards all classes in Korea with the utmost circumspection and sincerity so that her true purpose may not be mistaken or her intentions doubted. A residency-general will be established, but as to its personnel nothing will be known until after my return to Japan. There can, however, be no error in explicitly asserting that the policy of the Resident-General will not be in any sense revolutionary but will be one of gradual progress. If the state of affairs in Korea be examined, it is found that the relations between Sovereign and subject, government and governed, are of a very distant nature, and are by no means so close as those in Japan. Hence it becomes inevitable to adopt towards the Government measures of a more or less compulsory nature. The people, however, are eminently peaceful and quiet, and towards them therefore the policy pursued must be one of gentle persuasion. Those are points which have to be kept in view not merely by our officials but also by all Japanese subjects residing in Korea. Such Japanese subjects must carefully refrain from all acts of violence to which their country's victories may prompt them, and must be guided by a spirit of kindness in their dealings with the Koreans. Already the United States Representative in Seoul has received instructions from his Government for the removal of the Legation and it may be assumed that other Powers will similarly recognise Japan's convention. It will then be for Japan not to forget the duties that heaven has delegated to her, but to lead Korea gently and helpfully along the path of progress, for assuredly anything like arbitrary or coercive conduct will earn for Korea the sympathy of the nations and will defeat the true and abiding policy of Japan."

Subsequently Mr. Hagiwara explained that there would be no sudden or sweeping change in the administrative mechanism of the Empire, but advisers would be appointed to the various departments and that the measures taken would be deliberate and patient.

The Emperor of Japan has addressed to General Hasegawa a message of appreciation very similar in terms to that which His Majesty had previously addressed to Marquis Ito and Mr. Hayashi.

There are conflicting accounts as to the date of Marquis Ito's return, but the balance of opinion is that he was to leave Seoul yesterday (29th).

Korea is expected to send an Ambassador to Japan in recognition of the embassy of Marquis Ito.

Negotiations are in progress for a loan of a considerable sum from Japan to Korea in order to relieve the distress which has overtaken the mercantile classes in Seoul.

Thursday, November 30.

We have now an epitome of the speech delivered by Marquis Ito on the 27th of November at the entertainment given in his honour by the Japanese residents of Seoul and Chemulpo. The Marquis said that the Emperor of Japan, in commissioning him to proceed to Korea, had made use of the words, "Convey in my stead an exact statement of my sincerity." Such was the great duty entrusted to him. He was not an imon taishi (consolatory ambassador) as people commonly supposed. In reply to his Sovereign he had promised to carry out his Majesty's wishes with all the diligence shown by him for many years in the Imperial service. He had been received by the Korean Monarch in an audience which lasted four hours and he had explained to His Majesty in the fullest and most detailed manner both the present conditions and the future eventualities of the peninsular empire's foreign relations. A similar explanation had been offered to the Korean Ministers and there had resulted the Treaty of the 24th instant. That this difficult task had thus been easily concluded must be attributed to the benevolent and sincere spirit of his illustrious Sovereign, of which spirit he himself had merely been a humble exponent. It was true that the Koreans were not yet enlightened or progressive, but, for that reason, to coerce or to take advantage of them would be entirely foreign to the purpose or wish of the Mikado. They were to be led into the path of progress by the gentlest and the kindest means. Japan's conduct towards Korea was now the cynosure of the world's observation, and any resort to arbitrary or questionable methods would not only bring the country into discredit but also impair its interests. He himself had lost no time in conducting the negotiation entrusted to him, but none the less he felt the profoundest sympathy with the Koreans and desired to treat them with every consideration. He begged his hearers to endeavour to form a true estimate of their Sovereign's intention, which was that kindness and forbearance should be the guiding principles in all intercourse with the people of the peninsula.

In spite of the frequent announcements that Marquis Ito's stay in Seoul might be prolonged in deference to the Emperor's wishes, the Marquis left the Korean capital on the 29th ultimo and reached Fusan on the 30th. He was to leave the latter place on the 1st instant by the Manshu Maru, and the programme thereafter was to include a visit to Masampo. On the 28th ultimo he was received by the Korean Sovereign in an audience which lasted an hour and a half. We read in the Kokumin Shinbun's correspondence that the Emperor asked the Marquis to remain a little longer for the purpose of assisting Korea as her guide, but the Marquis explained that his duties at home could not be reconciled with a longer stay. He promised, however, that he should seek another opportunity of visiting Seoul.

There appears to have been an attempt on the part of Cho Pyong-sik to intimidate the Emperor. He is reported to have repaired to the Palace at the head of some 60 officials for the purpose of protesting against the new system. We gather from the somewhat meagre accounts transmitted over the wires that he and his following behaved with more than rudeness, and that it ultimately became necessary to place him under restraint. It should be mentioned that there is some uncertainty as to the name sent by the correspondents from Seoul. The Japanese characters represent in some cases "Cho Pyong-se," in others "Cho Pyong-sik;" the latter seems to us the more probable rendering since the person spoken of is referred to as an "elder statesman," which description would indicate Cho Pyong-sik, the envoy who came to Japan some years ago with a proposition for the neutralization of Korea under an international guarantee. Another official, Min Yong-chun, has been dismissed from office, and the same fate has befallen Li Keun-myong, who sought to create physical opposition to the carrying out of the new arrangements. The correspondent of the Kokumin Shinbun further states that seven would-be assassins, headed by a man whose name we gather to be Ki San-tuk, have been seized by the Japanese gendarmes. These men were all armed and there appears to be no doubt as to their intentions. Their examination revealed the facts that they are supported by certain persons of note and that their connexions may possibly be traced to very unexpected quarters. Whatever may be said as to the docility and law-abiding character of the Koreans, it is certain that assassination whether by the sword, poison or bombs is one of the very first resources they employ in all political troubles. The Jiji Shimpō's correspondent sends an account which appears to refer to the same incident. He calls the men apprehended "nominal students," and says that they came from Pyong-yang with the intention of assassinating the Ministers who had been consenting parties to the Convention.

Mr. Hayashi gave a farewell banquet to Sir John Jordan and Mr. McLeavy Brown on the 27th ultimo. They left Seoul for Peking on the following day.

The question of jurisdiction in Korea is likely to cause some trouble. This point is taken up by the Jiji Shimpō which urges that, pending the enactment of suitable Korean laws and pending the organization of competent Korean tribunals, Japanese courts should be established and Japanese civil law administered. The consular system is quite inadequate to meet even existing conditions and will become more than ever inadequate under the new regimen when the country will be thrown open widely to foreign intercourse. Complications between Japanese subjects and the subjects or citizens of foreign states may then be expected as a frequent occurrence and Japan having undertaken to conduct Korea's foreign relations will be responsible for the proper adjustment of these complications. A similar view is taken by the Asahi Shimbun, which contends that the organization of special courts is absolutely necessary, and points out, as does also the Jiji, that there has hitherto been absolutely no case of a Korean subject bringing suit against a Japanese in the latter's consular court. Neither journal mentions this with any pride. On the contrary, both appear to regard the fact as proof that the Koreans have no confidence in these courts rather than as a proof that no cause of complaint has presented itself. We may remark here that the critics who so bitterly condemn Japan's conduct in Korea constantly refer to her failure to provide proper courts for administering justice. They probably fail to note, that under the circumstances hitherto existing, consular tribunals had necessarily to suffice.

It is confidently stated that the Japanese Government has decided to build a railway from Seoul to Gensan. The distance is 129 miles and the cost is estimated at 20 million yen, but it appears to us that a previously published estimate of 15 millions is more likely to be correct.

RAILWAYS IN MANCHURIA.

Considerable interest attaches to the railways which will be built in Manchuria for the purposes of linking up the Korean and Manchurian systems. The projects conceived for that purpose were three. The first was a line from Wiju (New Wiju) on the Yalu to Fenghwang, thence to Lianshan and Motien, thereafter following the valley of the Taitsz to Liaoyang. The second was a coastwise line. This also was to set out from Wiju and passing through Hsuyen, was to strike the East-Chinese main line at Tashikiao. The third was to start from Antung, proceed to Fenghwang and Motien and finally reach Mukden. These three routes may be designated respectively the median line, the coast line, and the northern line. The coast line was open to special objection and the median line would have involved a very heavy piece of bridge-work over the Liao. In the case of the northern line, however, the great river can be spanned by a bridge 2,500 feet long. All things considered this northern route has been preferred. One good result of modern military operations on a large and protracted scale is that they leave behind them many much-improved roads and embryonic railways. Thus it appears that the Japanese troops, under the pressure of transport necessities, have already built a military line from Wiju via Fenghwang and Motien to within 29 kilometers of Mukden. The road was not carried right through on account of deficiency of material, but rails have now reached Hsiamatung, and the interval between that place and Mukden will be rapidly completed. There is a railway construction bureau in Manchuria having its head office at Chemulpo in Korea and a branch at Hsiamatung. A military line has a gage of only 2 feet, but its construction involves a good deal of bed-work which is subsequently available for the permanent way. Japanese engineers are now debating whether to convert the line into a $3\frac{1}{2}$ foot gage or into a 4 ft. $8\frac{1}{4}$ inch. The military have also constructed a line from Hsinmintun to Mukden and operations have already been commenced for converting it into a $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet guage. It is evident from all this that a very extensive system of railways in Korea and Manchuria will ultimately be in Japanese hands. In Korea there will be the Seoul-Chemulpo line and the Fusan-Seoul-Wiju line, with branches to Masampo, Gensan and other places. In Manchuria there will be the central line from Port Arthur to Changchun, the Kirin-Changchun line, the Mukden-Hsinmintun line, and the Wiju Mukden line. All this involves heavy outlay.

THE NEW FOREIGN LOAN.

The new foreign loan is an accomplished fact. It amounts to 50 millions sterling, the rate of interest being 4 per cent., the issue price 90 and the sum actually paid to the Treasury 88. Hence Japan receives 44 millions. The places of issue are London, Paris, New York and Berlin, and the debt is to lie unpaid for 15 years, after which it may be redeemed at any time according to the convenience of Japan, and it must be redeemed within 10 years. One half of the money is to be devoted to paying off the Empire's high-interest foreign debt. In this context it is necessary to note the exact figures of Japan's indebtedness to Europe and America. They are:—

	£.	Millions.
Amount of foreign loans bearing 5 per cent.	22
" " " 4½ per cent.	60
" " " 4 per cent.	10

It will thus be seen that if one half of the sum now to be actually received be applied as stated to redeeming the 6 per cent. debt, the latter will be exactly wiped off, and the foreign debt will assume the form of sixty millions sterling at 4½ per cent. and sixty millions at 4 per cent. The other moiety of the loan is to be applied to redeeming the high-interest domestic loans. With regard to these loans, 20 millions sterling of them are at 6 per cent. and 80 millions sterling are at 5 per cent. (We are here using round numbers). Hence if the Government follow the course indicated it will redeem the 20 millions sterling of 6 per cent. bonds and the domestic debt will stand at:—

Five per-cent. debt.....£80 millions.

We thus arrive at a possibility of seeing what the annual burden of Japan's total indebtedness will be in the matter of interest, namely £.	Millions.

Interest on 60 millions sterling of foreign loan at 4½ per cent.	2.7
Interest on 60 millions sterling of foreign loan at 4 per cent.	2.4
Interest on 80 millions sterling of domestic loan at 5 per cent.	4.0
Interest on total foreign and domestic debt of 200 millions sterling	9.1

Moreover, there will remain in the Government's hands a sum of 2 millions sterling, or, say 20 million yen, from the new loan. We presume that this sum is to be applied to the expenses of bringing back the armies from the front, or, perhaps to meeting outlays on account of rewards and pensions.

Thus in brief the Government's present financial scheme is to pay off all its 6 per cent. debts, domestic and foreign, and to obtain, further, a sum of 20 million yen the destination of which remains to be announced.

It is no doubt a heavy burden that Japan has to shoulder, namely, a payment of 91 million yen yearly on account of interest alone. But it is by no means a crushing burden.

As to the redemption of these loans, current rumour alleges that the sum annually allotted to the newly established Consolidation Bureau will be 120 million yen annually. If so, 91 millions of that amount will be devoted to paying interest and 29 millions to paying principal.

From what sources is this yearly sum of 120 million yen to be obtained? No answer to that question is immediately forthcoming, but it may be remarked that the war taxes are now producing annually 160 million yen, so that their reduction by 25 per cent. might be accomplished and the Treasury would still be in possession of a sufficient revenue for the service of the debt.

Among further details as to the new foreign loan the most striking is that there is no security given. Japan is thus proved competent to borrow abroad without giving any pledge other than her promise to pay, at a rate of 4.88 per cent., which is what the new loan works out at. Another detail is that Paris takes 24 millions sterling of the loan; London 13 millions; New York 6½ millions and Berlin 6¼ millions. The four great financial centres of the world become Japan's creditors, and France opens her pockets to both of the recent belligerents.

It is also notable that the rate of commission has greatly diminished. The rates hitherto given have been:—

Rates of Commission: 1st foreign war loan...	£3. 10s.
" " 2nd " "	£3. 15s.
" " 3rd " "	£3. 5s.
" " 4th " "	£3. 5s.
" " new " "	£2. 0s.

The money is to be paid to Japan between December of 1905 and May (inclusive) of 1906.

The Nichi Nichi Shinbun, the Fiji Shimpō and the Asahi all unite in condemning the new loan. They do not object to the terms, but they agree that to have floated this loan before the period when the six per-cent. securities become legally redeemable is a serious blunder. Those securities have to lie unredeemed for a further period of from three to five years, and if the Treasury desires to convert them at an earlier date, it must have recourse to the method of purchasing them in the open market, where they now stand at a premium of £2. Domestic securities belong to a different category in this respect: they are redeemable or convertible at any moment. But the first foreign six-per-cent. loan, of 10 millions sterling, does not become legally redeemable until August, 1909, and the second, of 12 millions sterling, until February, 1910. These loans can not be handled now except by the method of open purchase, and that will make them ruinously expensive. The Nichi Nichi is also very emphatic about the unwisdom of redeeming large blocks of domestic securities. It apprehends a plethora of currency, an appreciation of commodities and an outburst of speculative spirit which will plunge the country ultimately into even greater suffering than that which followed the war with China.

The Shogyō Shimpō (Business Men's organ), however, strongly approves the loan. It does not touch the question which mainly occupies the attention of the three journals quoted above, namely, the period of maturity, but confines itself rather to considering the great saving that will be effected in annual payments of interest. As to the contention that by throwing a large volume of capital upon the domestic market disastrous results will be caused, the Shogyō frankly declares that the Government having taken large sums from the people for the conduct of the war, is now under an obligation to refund some part at least of this capital, in the interests of commercial and industrial expansion. So far, indeed, is this journal from entertaining any apprehension such as that troubling the Nichi Nichi Shinbun, that it invites special attention to the fact of large quantities of the domestic six-per-cent. securities having passed into the hands of foreigners, and urges that instead of redeeming these, the Treasury should convert a part at any rate of the 5 per-cent. securities held at home. The Shogyō's calculation is that not more than one-fourth of the six-per-cent. domestic bonds now remain in Japan. We may note, incidentally, that if such be the case, the Nichi Nichi's fears about flooding the home market are not well founded.

The Chuo Shinbun is enthusiastic in its applause of the terms obtained, and congratulates the country upon the resulting reduction of its yearly liabilities. Our contemporary goes so far as to call the transaction one of the greatest victories in the war.

NAVAL NOTES.

The first-class armoured cruiser Tsukuba (13,500 tons), which was laid down at Kure in 1904, will be launched at 9 a.m. on the 12th of December. As this is the first vessel of her kind built in Japan, it is expected that an imposing ceremony will be organized on the occasion.

The Soya (Varyag) left Waka-no-ura on the 26th, where she had put in on account of stress of weather, but had to put back again, the gale still continuing.

The Hisen (Rituzan) reached Sascho on the 27th instant, in company with the Chinyen and Nenohi.

These last two items of news will be hard nuts for the Novoye Vremya. That journal has persistently denied the truth of the reports sent from Japan as to the raising of the vessels sunk at Port Arthur. In a recent issue it inserted a letter from a correspondent—apparently a Russian naval officer—who describes in apparently convincing language the terrible injuries suffered by these various vessels and declares that even though they were brought to the surface, a task of which he evidently doubts the possibility, they could not be made even temporarily seaworthy unless a dock were immediately available. Hence the first preliminary to resurrecting the buried war-vessels would be to build a dock, which the Japanese have not done. In fine this officer—his name seems to be Neychekoff—does not hesitate to declare that the statements sent from Japan are pure fictions, designed merely to cause chagrin to the Russians.

What strange estimates the Novoye Vremya and its correspondent must have formed of men and things! They have persuaded themselves to conceive it possible that for the sake of inflicting a temporary pang in Russian bosoms, the Japanese nation would willingly pose before the world as a congeries of the most unscrupulous liars in history. As a matter of incontrovertible fact the Rituzan is now at Sascho; the Angara is at Kure; the Bayan is at Maizuru; the Poltava is at Maizuru, the Peresviet is at Yokosuka; and the Shinshū at Takeshiki. Among these vessels those that performed the journey from Port Arthur unaided were the Peresviet and the Poltava. There remain at Port Arthur—afloat but not yet sent round to Japan—the Pallada, the Pobieda, the Gaidamak and the Posadnik. It is worth noting the fact that the Novoye Vremya's correspondent lays special stress on the case of the Peresviet and the Poltava, which vessels he describes as virtually destroyed. He ridicules the notion of re-floating them, yet these are precisely the two ships which have been able to make the voyage to Japan under their own steam.

The Soya (Varyag) arrived safely at Yokosuka on the morning of the 1st at 10 o'clock.

Mr. C. R. Lenzmann, of the firm of Messrs. Carlowitz & Co., has joined the Directorate of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, taking the place of Mr. Hans Schubart.

MILITARY MATTERS.

It is stated that the Emperor has sanctioned arrangements for a grand ovation on the occasion of the return of Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama and his staff to Tokyo. A representative of the Sovereign will attend at Shimbashi, where will be drawn up the whole of the Guards Division now in Tokyo, about ten thousand men. Artillery will take up its position in the Hibiya Park and fire a salute of 21 guns, and a numerous cavalry guard of honour will accompany the Imperial carriages which are to meet the Field-Marshal and his officers for the purpose of carrying them to the Palace. It is alleged that the whole of the workmen and officials of the Koishikawa Arsenal, to the number of thirty thousand, will be marshalled at Shimbashi, but we do not know of any place sufficiently spacious for such a purpose. The arrival in Tokyo is expected to take place on the 6th of December.

General Umezawa had a vociferous reception on his arrival in Tokyo on the 23rd inst. From General Terauchi downward all the prominent military officers in Tokyo, as well as a crowd of naval men, assembled on the platform at Shimbashi to greet him, and among cheering crowds he drove to the Palace where the Emperor thanked him cordially and presented him with a handsome memento of the occasion. The carriage in which he rode was escorted by a guard of honour and a salute of 9 guns was fired. Colonel Hume represented the British Legation among the many distinguished persons who greeted the returning General. We read that Major-General Umezawa is the fortunate possessor of two Kanyo, one given for Yangtsuling, the other for Penhsih.

The remains of Commander Shiraishi, celebrated as the leader of the Japanese storming party at the Taku forts in 1900, have been disinterred at Port Arthur. They were found to have been buried in a coffin, on the lid of which the cap of the deceased had been fastened, his name being inscribed inside. The body was habited in uniform, all complete except that the boot of the right foot was missing. There were many marks which rendered identification easy, but as such a long time had passed the skeleton only remained. Everything goes to show that this gallant officer carried out the intention announced by him at the time of starting on the third blocking expedition, namely, that he would attack the Russians single-handed rather than be taken prisoner. He seems to have landed wearing his waterproof coat and to have rushed at the nearest fort, losing one of his boots in the attempt to enter. He fell, of course, almost immediately, but the Russians were inspired with such respect for his gallantry that they paid special honour to his remains. The bones have been burned and the ashes are now on their way to Tokyo, together with the brave man's cap.

In the Kokumin Shinbun we find some interesting facts as to the transport service during the war. It appears that the number of steamers over 1,000 tons employed habitually by the Military Authorities was 118, with an aggregate tonnage of 320,000 tons; and in times of special stress the number rose to 158 with a tonnage of 420,000. As to the Navy, it employed regularly 61 vessels, displacing 180,000 tons, and at times 76 vessels displacing 230,000 tons. Thus the total figures are 179 steamers with a displacement of 490,000 tons in ordinary times, 234 steamers displacing 620,000 tons in time of emergency. Steamers of 100 tons and over constituted 80 per cent. of the transport fleet. The Navy took the best ships, many of them being employed as auxiliary cruisers. Moreover, experience showed that vessels most suitable for army transport purposes are not large and fast passenger steamers, but on the contrary, small vessels, with great beam, several decks, numerous hatches and powerful winches. In fact old-fashioned ships from 25 to 30 years of age proved eminently serviceable. Our contemporary thinks that these facts should be kept carefully in view, and that, when subsidies are granted hereafter to shipping companies, they should be required to have their steamers built with a view to the requirements of military transport.

At an early period of the war the principal medical men of Tokyo, to the number of 200, organized an association called the Ishi Hokoku-kai (Patriotic Medical Society), which rendered great assistance to the medical departments of the Army and Navy. The war being over, this association has now been dissolved, and at its farewell meeting Chief Surgeon Koike, head of the Sanitary Bureau, delivered a lecture from which we learn that the casualties in the Japanese Army and Navy during the war were:—

Killed and wounded	218,429

This is the first war on record in which the number of sick has been approximately equal to the number of killed and wounded. Generally the latter figure is several times as large as the former.

The Emperor attended the 18th ceremony of graduation at the Officers College on the 25th instant. Certificates were given to 920 graduates, namely, infantry 742, cavalry 24, field artillery 62, garrison artillery 13, engineers 66, and land transport 13. Ten graduates were the recipients of silver watches from the Emperor, in reward for special industry and aptitude. Among the graduates we observe the names of sons of Count Katsura, Lieut.-General Matsunaga, Lieut.-General Nakamura, Viscount Hisamatsu, Baron Tomioka, etc.

The Graduation Ceremony at the Edajima Naval College took place on the 28th November. H.I.H. Prince Arisugawa represented the Emperor. The number of graduates was 169, of whom 3 received special prizes from the Emperor.

General Kuroki was to leave Tieling on the 30th ultimo, and his return to Tokyo is expected to take place about the 10th instant.

Lieut.-General Asada reached Ujina on the 9th of November and is expected to reach Tokyo to-morrow (3rd).

ESPERANTO.

Mr. W. T. Stead is one of the most trustworthy of guides. He is essentially an enthusiast; a man of fads and fancies. Among his latest pets is Esperanto. Perhaps he is right this time. He certainly gives a most enticing account of the week's Congress held by the disciples of the new "world speech." Referring to an essay on the subject by Mr. Moscheles he says:—

Mr. Moscheles was impressed, just as I was, by the kindly atmosphere in which we breathed and moved during that memorable week. Which of us before had had the chance of talking freely with the most intelligent men and women of twenty-two nations? Whilst the "green star" was about in Boulogne, the usual order of things was reversed, and conventionalities were superseded, for green stars were worn by all sorts and conditions. You asked your way of a dockyardman and he touched your star and went out of his way to show you what you wanted, giving you in Esperanto all sorts of information. Introductions were nowhere necessary; you sat down beside another green star on the sands, and entered into conversation at once; you went into a shop, and the saleswoman literally sprang to help you; and in the tramcar and train, well! people who wanted absolute silence got out at the next station, for when Greek and Persian, Italian and Frenchman, Englishwoman and Spaniard, with a few other nationalities, filled up a compartment, Esperanto was found to be a most expressive language, and quiet did not reign though concord did. We do not profess to have studied "Esperanto" or to have any competence for pronouncing an opinion on its merits, but at a cursory glance we find difficulty in understanding how it can possess any great facilities for a Japanese. Consider the following:—

"LA ESPERO" IN ESPERANTO.

En la mondon venis nova sento,
Tra la mondo iras forta voko;
Per flugoj de facila vento
Nun de loko flugu ĝi al loko.

A LITERAL TRANSLATION INTO ENGLISH.

Into the world has come a new sentiment,
Through the world is going a mighty call;
On wings of light wind
Now from place let it fly to place.

A glance at this extract suffices to show that while Esperanto may be comparatively easy for Frenchmen, Italians, Englishmen and perhaps Germans, it offers no apparent facilities to a Japanese or a Chinese student. It is in fact an amalgam compounded of the cognate languages of Europe, and it has nothing in common with Japanese.

A JAPANESE BEER TRUST.

After long pourparlers and apparent failure to come to an understanding, the three beer companies, the Nippon, the Sapporo and the Osaka have agreed to unite and form one concern. This result is said to have been brought about largely by the advice of Baron Kioura, Minister of State for Agriculture and Commerce, and by the exertions of a committee consisting of Baron Shibusawa, Mr. Okura, Mr. Makoshi and Mr. Tanaka. A general meeting of shareholders is to be held next February for the purpose of endorsing the arrangement. As to terms, it is settled that the Osaka Company's shares shall be the unit, each Sapporo share counting for $1\frac{1}{2}$ shares in the combine, and each Nippon share for 2. We read in the Shogyo Shimpo—which journal has always advocated combination—that the manufacture of beer in Japan totalled 95,243 koku in 1904, being 20,000 koku above the figure for 1903 and 40,000 above that for 1902. This is a marked increase, but it is to be observed that in 1901, before the imposition of a tax the production reached 120,000 koku. The average for the 5 years ended in 1904 was 105,000 koku approximately, out of which quantity the three companies now combining produced no less than 90,000 koku. They will consequently be a very strong union, and the Shogyo thinks that the effect of the economies resulting from combination will be felt in the field of export. In 1902 the value of the beer exported from Japan was 520,000 yen; in 1904 it rose to 750,000 yen, and for the first ten months of the current year the figure is 1,210,000 yen. This last record is abnormal: it may be attributed in large part to the demand created by the war. The Shogyo is nevertheless persuaded that inasmuch as the demand for beer is steadily growing in China and Korea, a bright future lies before the Japanese beer companies.

THE "JIJI SHIMPO" AND BISHOP AWDRY.

The Jiji Shimpō has a characteristically moderate article on the subject of Bishop Awdry's letter to The Times; an article which partially warrants the Bishop's forecast that his criticisms would be received in a liberal and magnanimous manner by the Japanese. Nor can the Bishop be dissatisfied with the notice his letter has attracted. A man occupying so exalted a position and speaking through the columns of such a journal as The Times may always count on wide-spread attention. For our own part, looking at the comments not of the Jiji alone, but also of the Nichi Nichi, we can not but express admiration of the philosophical spirit they display. It appears to us that had such criticisms been penned by a Japanese against a European nation, the latter's organs of public opinion would have assailed the critic in a very different manner. The Jiji does not make the comment justly made by the Nichi Nichi, namely, that when Bishop Awdry undertook to condemn the commercial morality of the Japanese, he entered a field where he has no title to pass original judgment. What the Jiji says is simply that although among English men of business there may be found not a few whose idea of conducting a transaction is altogether wrong, still it can not be gainsaid that the standard of commercial morality in England is higher than it is in Japan. Japanese publicists themselves have often admitted the fact and have regretted it. As for the other sweeping charges preferred by the Bishop against Japanese truthfulness, Japanese nobility of character, Japanese morality and so forth, the Jiji does not examine them in detail. Of what use, indeed? Individual opinion and individual experience are the only guides of original verdicts in such matters, and to discuss the propriety of an individual's impression is to engage in what the Japanese call nizukake ron. But the Jiji does very strongly object to the Bishop's emphatic warning against marriages between English girls and Japanese men. Our contemporary naturally asks whether a defensive and offensive alliance between two nations is consistent with the Bishop's contention that there should be no alliances between the units of the two nations. Evidently, too, the Jiji does not think that the purity or the happiness of English home life warrants a solemn warning like that penned by Bishop Awdry. There is a skeleton in many an English household also, the only difference being that it is a skeleton within the cupboard, whereas the Japanese skeleton is often kept outside the cupboard. Controversy might exhaust itself without determining the relative advantages and disadvantages of the two systems. At any rate Bishop Awdry has interposed the authority of his veto against what might prove one of the most powerful factors in breaking down the barriers of racial and religious prejudices that still separate Japan from the Occident. We ourselves (Japan Mail) are inclined to ask whether in this matter any publicist is qualified to express any definite opinion without the testimony of experience. There has not been any sufficient experience of marriages such as Bishop Awdry condemns, and the experience there has been goes to invalidate his statement. For among marriages between foreign women—in the term "foreign" we include Europeans and Americans—and Japanese men almost no instances are included that support the Bishop's theory. Several cases of happy unions have been recorded and others are now before our eyes, but of unhappy unions we have not heard; or, at any rate, have heard so seldom that we feel justified in regarding them as quite exceptional. On what foundation then does Bishop Awdry's veto rest?

THE "KOREA REVIEW."

In the absence of its editor, Mr. Homer B. Hulbert, the Korea Review has fallen into hands which closely resemble those that wielded the journalistic pens of Yokohama twenty-five or thirty years ago. The likeness is quite striking. There is the same intemperance of language, the same bitter hostility to the Japanese, the same over-weening pride of race, the same incapacity to believe that anything good can come out of the East. We are perhaps wrong in using the plural form "hands", for the two articles which inspire these remarks must be attributed to one and the same hand since both exhibit a degree of literary ignorance very unlikely to be displayed by two members in the same small community—both are written by a man so ill-educated as to be unable to distinguish between the geometrical figure "hyperbola" and the figure of speech "hyperbole." It is not our intention to make any detailed reference to these articles; such a course would weary our readers and impart vicarious consequence to the articles. But we shall quote two statements in order to illustrate the spirit of the writer. In one essay on the Korean Customs, he makes this assertion:—"The Japanese Government has no official in its whole realm that can begin to handle the position as Dr. Brown has done and can do." This assertion appears in the sequel of a panegyric on Mr. McLeavy Brown's services, a well deserved panegyric. The second assertion relates to Mr. Alexiaeff. Of him the essayist has nothing but evil things to say. He calls him a "toy financier"; describes how he "exercised no control whatever" over the excessive outpour of nickels from the Mint, and says that he "immediately doubled all the official salaries, which brought down upon his head the blessings of countless rascals." After this damning criticism we are told that "there is little doubt that Mr. Alexiaeff was capable of handling the Customs service as any Japanese is likely to be." These allegations show clearly the blind prejudice and bitter hatred felt by the writer in the Korea Review towards the Japanese. His dislike of them is almost delirious, and betrays him into expressions so extravagant as to be quite comical. Is it not curious to observe how unfaithfully history repeats itself? The anti-Japanese tirades now published by local foreign journals in Seoul are a faithful echo, mutatis mutandis, of the attacks and condemnations that used to occupy so much space in the foreign local journals of Yokohama and Kobe a quarter of a century ago. But the Japanese have lived down their traducers of that era. They are also a faithful echo, mutatis mutandis, of the denunciations and abuse published by certain open port journals when Japan first assumed administrative power in Formosa. But the Japanese have lived down that hostile campaign also. Can there be any doubt that they will equally live down this attack in Korea, and that their assailants will ultimately be classed with the discredited revilers of the settlements and of Formosa?

The new cruiser Tsukuba will be launched on Dec. 12th at Kure.

MARTIAL LAW AND PRESS REGULATIONS.

The Official Gazette announces the repeal of the two urgency ordinances No. 205 and No. 206, the former being the Ordinance placing Tokyo under martial law, the latter the Ordinance conferring special power on the Minister of Home Affairs for the purpose of controlling the press. In the Hochi Shimbun we find a statement that the Government had intended to continue the enforcement of the Special Ordinances until after the settlement of the Korean and Manchurian questions and the conclusion of the trial of those arrested in connexion with the riot. The Korean question has now been settled; the Manchurian negotiations were within sight of settlement, and ample proofs have been collected against Mr. Kono Hironaka and his accomplices. But the Kokumin Shimbun gives a different explanation which we are much more inclined to credit. It is simply that the occasion has ceased to call for special measures. Good order has been completely restored and there is no reason to apprehend any renewed disturbance. The Kokumin claims, and justly we think, that these Ordinances were warranted by their results. Undoubtedly order was restored in face of conditions which seemed to promise fresh rioting, and undoubtedly order has since then been preserved most effectually. On the other hand, who can undertake to affirm confidently that the disturbance would have continued had the duty of checking it devolved on the police alone? Good order is the normal condition of Tokyo. The city has occasionally witnessed soshi outrages, but in 99 years out of every hundred the record of its citizens suggests that they could very well afford to dispense with police altogether. We shall now hear the Government's critics say that the rescinding of the Ordinances is a sop to the Diet or has been caused by political and journalistic agitation. Had they not been rescinded there would have been complaints against their continuance. Now that they are discontinued there will be accusations of double-dealing. The Cabinet can not possibly be in the right with some critics, a result for which ministers are doubtless fully prepared.

THE "SHIMBUN DOMEI-KAI" AND THE FOREIGN PRESS.

The promoters of the Shimbun Domei-kai (Newspaper League) are busying themselves to secure the coöperation of local foreign journals. The league has for immediate purpose to protest against the special ordinance recently issued by the Government in the sequel of the September riot; an ordinance which subjects the press to exceptional control and re-invests the Minister of State for Home Affairs with competence to suspend or suppress journals whose writings he considers calculated to impair public peace and good order. There have been several suspensions under the Ordinance, and naturally the journalists of Tokyo, Osaka, Kyoto and elsewhere are anxious to obtain the rescinding of such obnoxious legislation. They deserve sympathy, though it must be sympathy of a very qualified nature. For that they brought this inconvenience on themselves is beyond all doubt. Not since the earliest days of Japanese journalism has there been so flagrant an example of unreasoning and inflammatory writing as was witnessed last September on receipt of the peace news from Portsmouth. Newspapers which published matter so misleading and so disturbing merited some restraint. But the Ordinance has now been in force during nearly 2½ months and Japanese journalists think it high time that it should be revoked. To that end they are agitating, and to strengthen the agitation they are endeavouring to enlist the co-operation of foreign local journals. What view our contemporaries may take we do not know, but it appears to us that foreign newspapers have no becoming place in such a movement. It is not for them to meddle in Japan's domestic politics. A foreign editor has no political status in this country and he had better refrain from interfering with politics. That is our conviction.

REV. JOHN BATCHELOR'S AINU-ENGLISH-JAPANESE DICTIONARY.

A second edition of this lexicon has just appeared. Sixteen years ago the book made its first appearance. Such a work can not possibly find a wide market. An author's sole inducement to undertake the task must be furnished by the spirit of true scholarship. Mr. Batchelor tells us in his preface that he had not originally an intention of printing a second edition and consequently his revision was done by way of recreation and for the purposes of his missionary functions. During the past ten years, however, he has had applications from more than 500 friends who, the dictionary having passed out of print, were unable to obtain a copy of it. So he determined to re-produce it with all the amendments and additions furnished by long study. In the acknowledgements that he offers for assistance rendered he mentions first Baron Sonoda, Governor General of Hokkaido, to whom he dedicates the lexicon and who has written an highly appreciative preface. "My friend Mr. Batchelor," says the Baron, "has resided in Hokkaido for the space of nearly 30 years. When he first came to this island he almost at once commenced to study the Ainu language with the object of preaching the Gospel. He has visited nearly all the native villages and has at times lived entirely among the Ainu, making light of the hardships which had to be endured. In course of time Mr. Batchelor gained a free command of the native tongue as well as a full knowledge of the customs of the people. As a consequence Christianity has been widely spread among them and he has gained their full confidence." These latter testimonies to Mr. Batchelor's success will doubtless be welcomed by him more gladly than any tribute to his scholarship would have been. As for the dictionary itself, its reputation has already been established. We need only say that the new edition contains over 13,000 words, is printed in admirably clear type at the Tokyo Tsukiji Type Foundry and covers 525 pages. Following it is a most interesting grammar occupying 159 pages. When we remember that there is nothing which can be called Ainu literature, that the language is moribund like the race which uses it, and that it is mingled with Japanese and Russian words, often so much corrupted or transformed as to be well-nigh unidentifiable, we begin to realize the difficulties encountered by any one attempting to construct a grammar. Mr. Batchelor presented to the public in 1903 the first fruits of his studies along this line. He says that he did so mainly for the purpose of inviting criticism, but the result was the discovery—though this he does not say—that he himself stood alone in his knowledge of the Ainu language and that others had nothing to tell him except, indeed, to confirm him in his belief that Ainu belongs to the Aryan tongue as fully as do Latin, French, Greek or English. What is of special interest in this grammar, as now re-published in a greatly enlarged form, is that the author discusses minutely the affinities of the Ainu language, and thus arrives at the conclusion, long ago derived from other investigations, that the Ainu people originally reached Japan through the Amur region or Siberia. He gives also lists of Hebrew words and of Basque words resembling Ainu, and he dwells at some length on the Aryan connections of the language. It is tolerably certain that the world will never see this lexicon and this grammar superseded by any richer or more accurate work. Mr. Batchelor has intervened just in time to save the Ainu language from disappearance except as a partially reconstructed tongue.

THE "SEIYU-KAI" AND THE CABINET.

On the 27th November a deputation of the Seiyu-kai waited on the Premier to urge that the special restraining legislation now in force against the press had ceased to be necessary, and also to inquire as to the truth of the rumour that the Government contemplates selling the Fushun coal-mine to private persons. (The Sumitomo Family was spoken of by rumour). Count Katsura promised that the advice of the deputation with regard to the press should be duly considered, and stated, concerning the coal-mine, that its tenure was now a subject of negotiation with China and that the Government did not entertain any intention of disposing of it as suggested, the mine being, in effect, one of the adjuncts of the railway.

It said that the mine is now producing 1,000 tons of coal daily, 500 of which are used for locomotives and the remainder goes to the troops.

The Tokyo Prefectural Assembly has passed, by a large majority, a Bill calling for the abolition of the special system of police in Tokyo. But when this Bill was handed to the Governor, through whom it has to pass for submission to the Home Office, Baron Senge declined to receive it, on the ground that it was merely a replica of a resolution which the Assembly had previously passed and which had been returned by the Minister of Home Affairs who explained that such a resolution exceeded the powers of the Assembly inasmuch as it dealt with the organization of the administration, a matter expressly reserved among the Imperial Prerogatives. A curious deadlock is thus created. One fact, however, emerges clearly, namely, that the Government intends to reserve its right in the matter of the police. It may be taken for granted that the special system is doomed, but the day of its demise is not yet.

LOSS OF A TRANSPORT.

A transport called the Daisan Ikuta Maru has been lost. She left Moji on the 25th for Tairen and in the neighbourhood of Mutsure-jima collided with the Fuku-ura Maru, which was carrying home the 10th Regiment of Kobi. The Daisan Ikuta Maru sank in 8 minutes. She had on board 25 non-commissioned officers and men in charge of stores, 2 canteenmen and a crew of 54. The accident happened at night and would doubtless have involved heavy loss of life had not the scene been in the immediate vicinity of Mutsure-jima whence boats put off to the rescue. As it was eleven men perished, namely 6 non-commissioned officers and privates, 1 canteenman and 4 of the crew. There were no casualties on board the Fuku-ura Maru. The transport which sunk had a displacement of 2,243 tons. She was carrying 1,110 packages of clothing, writing materials and various commodities.

A telegram has been received in Osaka from Vladivostok to the effect that a Russian warship collided with the British steamer Suez in the harbour while the former was about to leave. Having sustained severe damage, the British vessel immediately sank. She arrived there on Nov. 21st from Shanghai with sundry cargo. A portion of the cargo was insured with the Nippon Marine Insurance Co., Osaka, for eight thousand yen. The insurance firm intend to lodge a claim with the Russian admiralty.

According to the crew of the steamer Akebono Maru which arrived on Nov. 25th at Moji from Chemulpo, a floating mine was observed in east long. 125 and north lat. 35, off Sang Cha-do, near Mukpho, Korea. Some of the crew tried to explode it by shooting at it with rifles. Their efforts, however, proved futile. They left an empty tin with a red-flag indicating the danger.

The small steamer Kochi Maru with rice and other cargo went ashore on the morning of Nov. 25th in the neighbourhood of Kure on her way from Osaka to Moji. Damage was sustained by both hull and cargo. Later the ship was floated. Another small steamer, the Daifuku Maru, collided on Nov. 25th with another steamer, the result being that the former sank. She was on her way from Unoshima to Mitsuhamu with coal.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun says that, although normal relations between Russia and Japan will be restored by the renewal of the treaty of Unity and Commerce and the mutual accrediting of Ministers, it is thought advisable, in order to place the two courts on their old friendly footing, that special Imperial Envoys shall pay visits to the two capitals. Russia will send Grand Duke Vladimir Michaelovitch, and Japan will send His Imperial Highness Field Marshal Prince Fushimi.

The section—17 miles long—of the East-Central State Railway has been completed and is to be opened to-day. This is the section from Fujimi to Okanoya. Its completion means that the road from Hachioji to Okanoya, 99 miles, is now in operation and that when the remaining section (16-17 miles) from Okanoya to Shiojiri is finished, it will be possible to travel by rail from Hachioji to Shiojiri. This last section was not among the works postponed on account of the war. Construction has been going on vigorously and the line will be ready for traffic in May or June. Goods from Echigo and Shinshu, which now pass through the Usui Tunnel, will then go over the Shiojiri-Hachioji road.

An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Tokyo City Electric Railway Company was held on the 23rd instant. The chief questions were to consider the resignation of Mr. Okamoto, a director and auditor, and to elect substitutes for or re-elect Messrs. Oda and Hakamada, two other auditors, whose period has expired. Mr. Amenomiya, chairman of the Board, being absent, Mr. Yoshida, managing director, presided. The meeting was extremely tumultuous. Repeated demands were made for information as to the cause of Mr. Okamoto's resignation, and when it appeared that the Directors could not or would not explain it, great dissatisfaction was shown. Finally, Messrs. Oda and Hakamada were re-elected and Mr. Mitani was chosen to replace Mr. Okamoto, after which a committee was appointed to consider the affairs of the Company. It is evident that great dissatisfaction exists among the shareholders. In spite of the splendid prospects of the enterprise the shares are falling, and rumours of fraudulent financing are rife. The Fiji Shimpō continues its attacks upon the Company, accusing it of bad management, of purchasing defective materials, of employing men simply as a matter of favoritism, of declaring unjustifiable dividends, of placing current expenses to the account of construction outlays, and of failing to develop its lines owing to the fact that capital is applied to dividends. All this is regarded as the outcome of Mr. Amenomiya's romantic scheme, the three-farthings uniform fare.

The Official Gazette of the 27th instant announces that the Japanese Government on the 25th instant officially recognised the position of Sir Claude MacDonald as British Ambassador at the Court of Japan. This appointment dates from the 1st of November and was intimated to the Japanese Government on the 17th of that month. It will probably suggest itself to some persons that there has been unexplained delay in connexion with this appointment. The fact is that Sir Claude was originally nominated "special ambassador," a title which did not include the idea of continued tenure. Hence not until the British Government decided to give him the post under normal conditions were the usual official announcements in order. It may now be reasonably hoped that Japan will have the good fortune to be the scene of Sir Claude's labours for another period of five years. He has well deserved the exceptional promotion which now falls to his lot.

On the 25th instant the Minister of State for Justice gave a banquet in honour of Mr. Montague Kirkwood. The guests included the Vice-Minister, the President of the Supreme Court, the Procurator General, the Presidents of the Appeal Courts of Tokyo, Osaka, Hiroshima and Hakodate and of the Local Courts of Tokyo and Yokohama, &c. The Minister, in proposing Mr. Kirkwood's health, alluded in appreciative terms to the services of that gentleman, and Mr. Kirkwood, in replying, spoke of the events of the past two years and of the pleasure he found in seeing again his old friends. In the evening Mr. Kirkwood was the guest of the Inns of Court Association at the Tokyo Club, and on Monday he was received in audience by the Emperor.

It is stated that the regular salary of the new Japanese Ambassadors will be 5,000 yen annually with a contingent allowance—or a service fund (saikin ho) as it is called in Japan—of 30,000 yen annually. The only increase of staff will be the addition of a Counsellor of Embassy. Nothing is said as yet concerning the countries to which ambassadors will be accredited or about the officials likely to be nominated.

Upon the borders of Hitachi, Iwaki and Shimotsuke there is a mountain called Hakko-zan which now furnishes a topic of conversation. It is believed that gold may be found there in considerable quantities. Some time ago a company was formed to exploit the mine. The capital of the company was put at 500,000 yen, and was shown as fully paid up, though, as a matter of fact, not a yen was forthcoming, the whole of the money being set down as "expended on the purchase of the mine." Some operations of scratching the ground were then undertaken, but mining was less the object of the projectors than share speculation. They succeeded in getting the shares quoted on the Exchange and not a few were sold at good prices. But on the 25th when some one attempted to dispose of his holding a fall of 40 yen a share was suddenly recorded. Something like a panic resulted. Many holders of shares were unable to put up their margins and rumour found an opportunity to connect several names with the fiasco. It would appear that there certainly has been fraudulent action somewhere.

Many of our readers are familiar with a map published some two years ago by the Amur Society of Japan. It represented the regions of Russia's political activity in East Asia, namely, the area stretching eastward from Lake Baikal to Saghalien and southward from the Amur to the Yellow Sea. Being on a scale of 1 in 1,650,000, it formed a sheet some 6 feet square, and was beyond all comparison the most accurate and comprehensive chart procurable of the regions in question. The same society has now formed a project to construct a similar map of northern India, the idea being that a region which has been brought into such prominence by the Anglo-Japanese Alliance should be delineated in a manner much more thorough than that of any map now extant. Mr. Uchida Ryohel is the moving spirit in this matter. He tells us that the programme is to publish 500 maps by subscription so as to provide funds for the enterprise. "Funds" may sound a formidable term, but it is extraordinary how cheaply the Japanese manage to work. The actual printing of the map is expected to cost a little over 2 yen per copy and the outlays involved in collecting information are estimated at 1,500 yen, so that if 500 copies of the map can be sold at 5 yen each, the total expenses will just be recouped. This is an enterprise which seems worthy of every encouragement to say nothing of the great interest attaching to a map of these regions on a large scale. Persons desirous of subscribing are therefore invited to write to Mr. Uchida Ryohel, whose Tokyo address is No. 55, Tansu-machi, Azabu. The price per copy will be 5 yen for subscribers and it is expected that the map will be ready for delivery by March or April of next year.

It is officially announced that the American Charge d'Affaires in Tokyo has informed the Foreign Office of the withdrawal of the United States Legation in Seoul. The United States Legation in Tokyo will assume charge of the persons and property of United States citizens in Korea. Thus the United States Government has been the first to recognise Japan's new status in the peninsula by withdrawing its Legation.

Just at this moment when the adjustment of Japan's national debt after the war is attracting much attention, it is interesting to quote what Professor Rudolf Martin recently wrote about Russia's debt. We take M. Warky's resumé :—

The annual interest on the Russian debt exceeds $175,000,000, of which $132,000,000 is paid to foreign bond-holders. If we add to this amount the interest on private debts of $30,000,000, and $27,000,000 spent by Russia abroad, we have $189,000,000 which Russia must each year pay out to foreign countries. As Russia has no capital placed abroad, this $189,000,000 must be paid from the excess of exports over imports. Now this excess, which is primarily dependent on the size of the harvests, is about $94,000,000 per year, according to the statistics from 1894 to 1903; the $95,000,000 must, therefore, be provided by new loans. And in five years, when the consequences of the war will be felt to the fullest extent, the interest on loans will have increased to at least $312,000,000 and in twenty years to $400,000,000 per year. France, Herr Martin says, never had more than a debt of $3,000,000,000 before 1870; the war increased the debt of the country more than $2,500,000,000. Therefore, we may reasonably suppose that the debts of Russia will increase in proportion; that in five years they will amount to $6,250,000,000, and in fifteen years to $9,000,000,000. There is in this analysis one point not easy to endorse, namely, the postulate that a country which has no capital placed abroad is without any asset available for paying interest on foreign debts except excess of exports over imports. It certainly has no other way of replenishing its stores of specie unless it be the happy possessor of gold or silver mines. But the proceeds of taxation are the direct source from which interest on a foreign debt is paid by the Government of a country, and so long as the tax-payer can discharge his obligations to the Treasury, in other words, so long as the stock of current specie is not exhausted, that interest can be paid. In the long run exports have to be relied on, but to affirm that such a necessity impends at any given moment is not within the competence of any economist.

Anything publicly stated by Mr. Andrew Carnegie carries great weight. It is unfortunate, therefore, that he should have indirectly endorsed the idea that the dispute between Russia and Japan might have been submitted to the Hague tribunal, thus avoiding war altogether, had not Japan suddenly attacked while peaceful negotiations were still in progress, thus rendering arbitration impossible. Mr. Carnegie referred to this "explanation" with evident credence on the occasion of his installation for the second time as Lord Rector of St. Andrew's University. Had he looked a little more closely he would have detected that arbitration in such a dispute was never for a moment possible inasmuch as faithful observance of the arbitrators' award must have depended on the volition of the disputants, one of whom had shown that treaties and conventions have no binding effect on it. Before Japan struck, every hope of a pacific solution had totally disappeared. Mr. Carnegie may not have time to read history. We venture to suggest that, in that case, he had better refrain from historical assertions.

It is stated that a number of influential Japanese are endeavouring to obtain the appointment of Count Arco Valley as German Ambassador in Tokyo. A petition to the Kaiser is receiving numerous signatures. Everyone of every nationality must hope for the success of this movement.

News has been received of the death of His Royal Highness Philippe Count of Flanders, brother of the King of Belgium. The Count was a Lieut.-General in the service of Belgium, and was born in March, 1837. The Official Gazette announces Court Mourning in Japan from the 29th instant to the 6th proximo.

It must be confessed that the arrival of three Russian cruisers, the Rossia, Gromovoi, and Bogatyr, on the 29th ultimo at Nagasaki is difficult to explain in the face of the alleged disturbances in Vladivostok. One imagines that the proper course for these war-ships to pursue would have been to remain in Vladivostok and to assist in restoring and preserving order. Japanese accounts adhere to the original version, namely, that on the outbreak of the insurrection, the three cruisers immediately left Vladivostok and made their way to De Castries Bay, whence they ultimately proceeded to Vladivostok, concerning which place they have no recent intelligence. The explanation which suggests itself to us is that the ships were under orders to return to Europe, and that they left Vladivostok in obedience to those orders attaching no special importance to the riot which had then begun to develop. The version given by Japanese correspondents reflects on a quality in which the Russian have never been wanting.

The Privy Council's meeting on the 28th ultimo is said to have approved of the establishment of Japanese embassies in five Occidental capitals, namely, London, Washington, Paris, Berlin and St. Petersburg. The ambassadors in these cities will, of course, be entrusted with the duty of looking after Korean interests also.

There are no conjectures as to the personnel of the Resident-General in Seoul, though his nomination must be very imminent. A strong opinion evidently exists against the appointment of a military man. It is thought that if the Korean problem be approached in the spirit of conquest, an error will be made entailing endless labour to rectify. The military element's place in the new order must be important, but it should be distinctly subordinate. The ideal Resident-General would be a man—like General Kodama, for example—who possesses at once authority with the military and a thoroughly ruling sentiment in favour of civil processes. But there are not many Kodamas.

Count Inouye did not give his usual garden party last year owing to the war, but it took place this year on the 28th instant, and was a very brilliant affair, the weather being sunny and the garden looking beautiful. Many rare objects of art were displayed. The guests were not very numerous: they did not exceed five hundred.

The Japan Herald alleges that "all the foreign papers, with the exception of the Japan Mail, have been invited to cooperate" in the Newspaper League. The statement is untrue.

CHURCH OFFERTORIES IN ENGLAND.

(CONTRIBUTED).

According to a number of letters which appeared in the columns of the London Daily Mail in September last, the contributions made at Sunday services and on other occasions have in recent years declined to an alarming extent. To this subject the Vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Twickenham, called attention in a sermon preached on Sept. 17th. The Rev. Percival Smith asked his congregation if they gave liberally enough. "Are there not too many coppers?" asked the Vicar. "In this fashionable church last Sunday there was a congregation of 400 people. The collection included a hundred small silver coins and two hundred coppers! You who put coppers into the bag and can afford to give silver would not put in coppers if your neighbour could see what you are giving."

The following Tuesday the subject was taken up by the editor of the Daily Mail in an article entitled "Coppers in Collections," in which Mr. Smith was commended for having brought the matter before the English public. The Daily Mail says: "However large the congregations in churches and chapels, however wealthy the individuals who compose those congregations, their offertories have in most cases for some years been steadily declining, and the proportion of copper to silver in the collection bag or plate has been as steadily augmenting. There are few ministers or clergy who would not have painful revelations to make if they spoke out after the manner of Mr. Smith at Twickenham." The editor proceeds to inform his readers of a more striking case of parsimony in giving than that manifested at Twickenham. Assembled in a certain City Church there was a congregation of 14 well-to-do persons. The collection amounted to s.3/0, of which a wealthy banker contributed 2s. 6d. The Daily Mail alludes to the mean advantage taken of the secrecy of the offertory bag by certain church-goers in contributing buttons and foreign coins of little or no value in England. One person referred to this practice in the following notice:—

"Any members of the congregation desirous of contributing buttons to the church funds are requested to leave them on the garments to which they belong and to hand in to the clergy these garments for the use of poor parishioners." The falling off in the attendance at churches is alluded to by the Daily Mail. The week-end excursion tickets which at a very cheap rate allow of absence from London from Friday to the following Tuesday account for the non-attendance on Sunday of many London church-goers. But the country churches do not seem to reap any benefit from this either pecuniarily or otherwise. "The difficulty," says the Daily Mail, "of inducing people to go to church at all is so great that the clergy are reluctant to ask their congregations not only to come, but also to contribute generously." This editorial called forth a number of letters on the subject. Some of the writers were indignant that Mr. Smith should have spoken so disparagingly of coppers, as though the church were almost exclusively for rich people. One writer said the clergy should preach against showy dresses more, that all his spare money was swallowed up in paying his daughters' bills, etc.; while another relates how astonished a certain German was to observe how little rich England contributes at Sunday services. One writer points out that even pennies when contributed by a number of children in one family, added to the silver given by the parents, amounts to a good annual sum. In his own case, though he had a limited income, it came to £8 a year, to which another £6 had to be added for pew rent. The general opinion seemed to be that people are not to be badgered into giving in the way attempted by Mr. Smith. Four well-dressed people left his church before the collection was taken up as a protest against the spirit of his remarks. Another very important point made by some correspondents was the need of greater democratisation in Church government and greater fraternisation among Church members. One correspondent writes:—"Permit me to ask what voice have church congregations in the selection of their ministers? What voice have they in the government of the church? The working man has virtually none, the middle class very little. How then can you expect the laity to give generously where they have no power, where the incumbent is the nominee of a patron, the wishes of the congregation being practically neglected? The Nonconformist churches do not complain of the same parsimony, because they select their ministers and govern their churches; consequently they give what is necessary, and even more, for they recognize the claims upon themselves to support what they possess." Church donations are compared with tips by one correspondent, who refers to a gentleman who smokes shilling cigars regularly, who gives a railway porter 6d for opening a carriage door and who gives shilling tips to a waiter at a luncheon and so on, and yet puts no more than 6d in the plate. In summing up the result of the controversy the Daily Mail says it is impossible to escape from the conviction that the real cause of the decline in giving is the growth of unbelief, the disapproval felt in the minds of church-goers of the doctrines preached from the pulpit. As one correspondent puts it: "A lack of believers, and a plenitude of mere frequenters in the State Church is one cause of the meagre collections." One correspondent thus states his opinion "(1) Men are driven from the Church of England services by reason of the doctrine preached and the ritual practised. (2) Men resent these things. (3) Men hold the purse. (4) Sympathy and support are cooled and attenuated; suppressed resentment takes their place. (5) What our hard-headed and less educated forefathers would not have, the men of to-day are not going to tolerate and support."

MISS OLGA KHROOSTCHEFF AT THE PUBLIC HALL.

The concert given by Miss Olga Khroostcheff at the Public Hall on Saturday evening was deserving of a far larger audience than that which gathered upon the occasion. Perhaps the management were principally to blame, for although Miss Khroostcheff was here some three years ago, and her eminent abilities as a pianist were known to some, still the failure to announce the proposed programme deterred many among the more recent comers to these shores from venturing forth on a chill, raw autumn night to hazard the unknown. But as it turned out the stay-at-homes lost a treat, while the virtuosos revelled to their hearts' content. Miss Khroostcheff's programme, though not on such an ambitious scale as her previous performance here had led us to expect, was still graded to a moderately learned taste, and in none of the items which she gave did she disappoint or fall below the high level of her former attainments. Whether she was accompanying strings—as in the opening trio, where she completely subordinated her personality to the other players, and, unlike so many solo pianists did not for an instant exalt the piano above the violin and 'cello—or whether as a soloist she was interpreting Moszkowsky, Chopin, Rubinstein, Henselt, Goddard or Liszt, she proved herself a thorough musician, with a wonderful mastery of her instrument, a perfect ear, a sympathetic touch, and a classical regard for the innermost ideas and strivings of the Masters. No wonder that she was recalled, and that her finale selection—despite its concluding "fireworks"—sent her audience home with the most delightful recollections of a perfect evening. Miss Khroostcheff was assisted by several amateurs, whose efforts were greatly appreciated, particularly Mr. Salinger, who had to respond to a most enthusiastic encore for his 'cello solo in the second part. Mr. Salinger, too, is to be congratulated on his choice of an accompanist, seldom have we had the pleasure of listening to two musicians so sympathetic in interpreting their respective parts. We append the programme:—

Mr. von Syberg, the German Consul-General, presented on Tuesday decorations of the Fourth Class of the Red Eagle to Mr. Ikariyama, Chief of the Kagacho Police, Mr. Ishida, Harbour Master; and Mr. Hamada, formerly Superintendent of the Kanagawa Ken Police. These honours are in connection with the recent visit of Prince Karl Anton of Hohenzollern.

BISHOP AWDRY ON JAPANESE CHARACTER.

BISHOP AWDRY'S letter to The Times on Japanese character together with a letter which it evoked from the Manager of the Publication Department of that journal have attracted so much attention in Japan that it may be well to say a word about them in these columns, and with that intent we reproduce the letters elsewhere.

They are very interesting letters and in one respect at all events we heartily agree with Bishop AWDRY. He detects an actually existing danger and applies himself to avert it; the danger that foreign appreciation of the Japanese having been carried to hysterical lengths, a re-action equally extravagant may set in unless timely warning be given. Contributions to newspapers and magazines on the subject of the Japanese have not been marked by sobriety of judgment. Sobriety of judgment is not attractive to the average reader now-a-days. He likes sensation; likes accounts that appeal to his emotional faculties and depict beings as far as possible removed from the common-place. This taste of his has been amply pandered to. A great many publicists have vied with one another to draw striking pictures of Japanese heroism, so that a nation which, morally speaking, was almost trampled under foot a few years ago, has now been set on a pedestal so high that a fall would be catastrophic. Bishop AWDRY wants to prevent the catastrophe and to that extent we are entirely with him. But does he appreciate, we wonder, that such writing as his own must tend to bring about the catastrophe by precipitately tearing down the pedestal? Probably he does not. Indeed we may almost affirm that he does not, for his letter is pervaded by a tone of kindness and sympathy incompatible with any such purpose. Yet it is undoubtedly true that he pens a very repellant indictment against the Japanese. They are not "noble"; they are not "moral"; they are not "honest in trade"; they do not "scorn to tell a lie"; they are not "strongly individual"; they are without "individual energy and self-dependence." It is not to be denied that this is a very repulsive analysis. One is inclined to inquire, in the first place, what are Bishop AWDRY's qualifications for framing so wholesale a verdict. He does not use any modifier such as "I think," or "so far as my experience goes," or "in my opinion." He speaks with absolute certainty. Possibly that is due to a didactic habit of thought often observable in men accustomed to preach much from the pulpit. In this matter, however, we have no concern with Bishop AWDRY's episcopal title or with his pretensions as preacher of a gospel whereof to change even a letter is to be anathematized. His opinion deserves no consideration higher than that due to the opinion of any intelligent observer; and indeed we are persuaded that he would himself be the last to claim any special deference. The conclusion, then, is scarcely avoidable that he has exceeded the bounds of legitimate criticism. Nine years' residence in Japan is inadequate to equip a man for such assured analysis as Bishop AWDRY undertakes. The writer of this article has passed more than four times as long among the Japanese, yet he recognises his experience and observation to be quite insufficient for any judgment of the finally confident kind pronounced by Bishop AWDRY. At the risk of seeming rudeness we must be permitted to say that no man after only nine years' experience has a right to cast such positive aspersions upon the character of a nation, above all when the nation is one speaking a language that demands at least a decade of hard study to acquire, using a script equally difficult to decipher, and following customs so special that access to the domestic life of the people is virtually denied to an alien.

If Bishop AWDRY surprises us by the assurance of his judgments, their scope is not less striking. Thus the first of his charges against the Japanese is that they are deficient in nobility. What is nobility? We understand the term as signifying the quality of being superior to whatever is low, mean, degrading and dishonourable. Does the Bishop really intend to deny the possession of that quality by the Japanese? His language plainly implies that he does, yet we hesitate to interpret him literally. It seems more likely that while on the one hand, he has no real intention of claiming the omniscience implied by his confidence; so, on the other, he did not fully weigh the value of his expressions when he chose them. The tone of his letter is too kindly to accord with the hypothesis that he intends to pronounce such a damning sentence against the Japanese nation. We prefer to assume that he has written more than he purposed saying. On any other assumption his propositions are difficult to reconcile, for magnanimity is almost synonymous with nobility of character, and after denying the possession of nobility by the Japanese, he declares in almost the next sentence that he has never met any people so glad to be told of their defects or so ready to give good-tempered heed to a criticism. Is there any higher test of magnanimity? The Bishop "has not the slightest fear" but that his essay, scathing as it is in many respects, "will bring to the writer gratitude rather than dislike by its plain speaking, if it should find its way back to the Japanese press." Yet he says that the Japanese are not noble!

Immorality, dishonesty, falsehood and subservience to environment—these are the other defects which Bishop AWDRY finds in Japanese character. The first is difficult to discuss but we may fairly ask, where in Japan are the evidences of this immorality to be so plainly seen. Do men lead purer lives in the West? Do women show greater modesty? Is virtue more highly valued or more imperatively enforced? Are the externals of vice less openly thrust under public gaze? Do married folks practise greater fidelity to each other? Is the tone of conversation purer? Are scandals less numerous? We offer no answer to these questions, but we invite Bishop AWDRY to consider them with the dispassionate justice which we know to be dear to him.

As for dishonesty, he has received a curiously striking rejoinder from a prominent member of the staff of the very journal to which he addressed his criticism. It is a reply which will furnish food for thought. We desire to supplement it with half-a-dozen words. If Bishop AWDRY intends his condemnation to apply to traders only, is it fair; does it begin to be fair, that the critic should not have distinctly marked this differentiation? And if no such limit be contemplated, then we invite Bishop AWDRY to say whether he considers the nobility and gentry of Japan to be dishonest; and whether he considers the agricultural, the artisan and the labouring classes to be dishonest. Has he ever succeeded in getting a policeman to take a present or a porter on a Government railway a tip? Has he not found among the farming and artisan classes a degree of honesty that is almost arcadian, and has he not repeatedly heard of common labourers, even jinrikisha coolies, picking up money and faithfully handing it over to the nearest police-station? The Nichi Nichi Shinbun, in a strong criticism of Bishop AWDRY's essay, denies his right to bring, on his own authority, sweeping charges against the integrity of Japanese traders since his personal knowledge of their dealings must be most limited. It is a just rejoinder, but it might, we think, be extended to the whole of the Bishop's analyses, for his own experience can not have embraced the very wide area covered by his condemnations.

Concerning the comment "men so brave" should "scorn to tell a lie," Bishop AWDRY may be reminded of the old Japanese precept, Bushi ni nigon nashi. He will say that it is not observed. Perhaps not. We need not go back to the days of the Psalmist to find wholesale denunciations of human veracity. The quality of Japanese truth is not to be gaged, however, by newspaper discussion. Verdicts will differ according to experience, and our own experience teaches us that there is little to choose between Japanese and Occidentals in this matter. Our own experience and observation teach us also that no greater error could easily be penned than Bishop AWDRY's assertion:—"Among jockeys the Japanese will live and talk as a jockey, among gentlemen as a gentleman." On the contrary we should have said, and in 38 years of acquaintance we can not recall one exception, that the Japanese gentleman is always a gentleman, whether among his own kind or among the lowest plebeians. Again, when Bishop AWDRY penned his criticism about the subserviency of the Japanese to their surroundings, had he asked himself how much of their old civilization remains after a cycle of contact with the West? It must indeed be freely conceded that their history during the past forty years has been a history of imitation and adoption, but it must also be conceded that they have preserved their best national qualities intact, although, according to Bishop AWDRY, they have been moving in an environment of nations who are deficient in this particular group of qualities.

One word in conclusion about Bishop AWDRY's warning to English girls against marriage with Japanese. We agree with the Bishop that such unions are inexpedient unless the girl has had some experience of the Japanese mode of living and is sufficiently pliant to adapt herself to it. For Japanese men still love their old fashions of mat-sitting and kimono-wearing. They will not easily give them up. There is no valid reason why they should give them up, and a wife who constituted herself such a reason would be likely to produce some friction in the household. But the Bishop's caution in the matter of mothers-in-law is difficult to understand. We are almost disposed to think that he is confounding the cases of a man adopted by marriage into a family and a woman wedded in the ordinary manner. A man thus circumstanced often finds his mother-in-law a difficulty, but so far as a woman is concerned we have never heard that the mother-in-law problem constitutes a greater trouble in Japan than it does in any European country. Indeed it scarcely enters the field of practical questions at all for married men, except when they are muko-yoshi, seldom live with their parents.

In making these comments we do not wish to be understood as ignoring the high spirit of duty which evidently induced Bishop AWDRY to write as he has done. It would have been much pleasanter and easier for him to have held his peace. It would be much pleasanter and easier for us also to hold our peace.

MORALITY IN JAPAN.

IN commenting recently on the accusations of immorality preferred against the Japanese by certain foreign writers, inter alios BISHOP AWDRY, we said that the subject was difficult to discuss, and we propounded certain questions which the accusers might advantageously set themselves to answer. A correspondent now addresses us as follows:—

So much is being said about Japanese immorality, that I feel bound in justice to point out that the persons most loud in their complaints on this subject constantly manufacture their own cases, in so far as the lower classes are concerned. I have kept house, in many countries, for some thirty years past, and nowhere have I seen such cynical carelessness of the virtue of women servants as in foreign, and especially in missionary, households in Japan. In a Japanese establishment the "maids" sleeping places are in the interior of the house and entirely separated from the quarters of the men; in foreign homes here, the more or less detached "servants' rooms" receive both sexes indiscriminately. I could cite many examples of this brutal carelessness, for the foreign mistress is loud in her complaints and demands for sympathy when a scandal has developed, but the two which I relate will suffice.

A very pious and highly educated American woman told me that when she first came to Japan she had two servants, a "boy" and a young maid. They were housed in the usual manner, away from the family apartments. Having occasion one night to call the maid suddenly, the mistress went to look for her, and found her sleeping in the man's arms. On waking both servants and asking what the irregularity meant, she was told that they looked upon each other as brother and sister, that their relations were purely platonic, and that they were simply following a custom universal in the country. The mistress accepted the statement and allowed the arrangement to continue. When, in due time, a child was born in the servants' quarters, she was properly revolted and incensed, and ever after maintained that the Japanese were a hopelessly degraded and immoral people.

During this past summer, while the great missionary conference was taking place in Kaiuizawa, some "Lights of Christianity" there had as servants a young man, and a handsome young married woman whose husband was away. These two slept all summer in a tiny apartment divided by the usual shoji. I have not yet heard the conclusion of the story, but it will probably be the obvious one.

Given these conditions, would not the results be the same in every country in the world?

This introduces a phase of the question which has probably presented itself to few observers but which has been familiar to us for many years. It is scarcely too much to say that in numerous cases the carelessness shown by foreign residents in providing suitable accommodation for their Japanese servants is almost incredible. No attempt is made to separate the quarters of the men from those of the women, a duty which would be considered sacred were European or American servants concerned, and often the rooms allotted to the domestics present an almost shocking contrast with those provided for members of the family. We have seen houses, especially inns kept by foreigners, where the menials, male and female, had to choose between not sleeping at all or sleeping in the same room without even the flimsy partition alluded to by our correspondent. The inference drawn by the servants themselves is that their foreign masters and mistresses attach very little importance to morality since they make such scanty provision for its protection; and the inference drawn by the masters and mistresses, when natural consequences ensue, is that Japanese morality has very little practical reality. The thing works both ways, for the better class of servants will not stop in such houses, and the foreign employers construct from the faults of their domestics sweeping indictments against Japanese character in general. It is safe to allege that any foreigner found complaining of the defects and untrustworthiness of Japanese servants, will on investigation be found to give himself habitually no concern about the creature comfort or moral welfare of those he employs. A keen-sighted Japanese once remarked in the writer's hearing that a greater number of women minus their obi might be seen in a foreign settlement in one day than could be observed in a Japanese town during a twelvemonth. The indication is that the female servants in foreign houses are generally without self-respect, and we are thus brought to the often stated proposition that the Japanese frequenting the foreign settlements are of a very inferior class. Many years have passed since, in the days of Sir FRANCIS PLUNKETT's presidency at the Legation in Tokyo, a number of the foreign merchants of Tokyo protested strongly against the imputation that their Japanese clients were "remnants of an evil past," and maintained that a marked improvement had taken place. Perhaps so; but we are bound to say that to meet veritable dregs of the trading population no surer place can be discovered than the trains plying between Yokohama and Tokyo. There the second-class carriages, morning and evening, transport specimens of commercial men not to be seen in such profusion anywhere else so far as our experience goes. The sum of the matter is that the foreign resident lives in a comparatively depraved Japanese environment and forms a false estimate of the whole nation accordingly. The European public has been warned against expecting that virtues usually correlated in the Occident will be found thus associated in Japan. But it has not been warned against imagining that conditions suggestive of vice in the Occident may admit no such interpretation in Japan. A great many corrections have to be applied to any list of data collected by a foreigner in this country before they can be safely used for constructing general theories.

"THE KOKKA."

No. 186 of this beautiful magazine has just been published. It stands on the same high level as its predecessors. Morigage Kusumi, the famous pupil of the still more famous Tannyu, occupies a large space in this issue. An interesting account of his life and a valuable analysis of his style are contributed by Mr. Kosaku Hamada, and the essay is illustrated by faithful reproductions of some of Morigage's best paintings. They show not only his remarkable power of brush but also the great versatility of his genius. His landscapes, however, are not entirely free from the conspicuous fault of the Sesshu School, nor do they reach the standard of Motonobu's incomparable master-pieces. The second subject discussed is a portrait of Hitomaro, the renowned poet who flourished in the 7th century and is thus in truth one of the bards of antiquity. The essay accompanying this picture, and the two next on "A Characteristic Example of the Momoyama Byōbu" and a "statue of Kwannon," are anonymous, which is a pity as they well deserve to be signed. Then we have the first part of an interesting article by Ryuzo Torii on "Artistic Designs used by the Miao-tze Tribe," and finally a "List of Buildings and Art Treasures under the Special Protection of the State." The list is lamentably small so far. It vividly recalls the regrettable fact that thousands upon thousands of incomparable specimens of Japanese art have passed into the hands of foreigners by few of whom are they fully appreciated. We must not close this brief reference without a word of applause for the exquisite collotypes of Mr. Kazumasa Ogawa. They are absolutely true to their originals.

The Norwegian community of Yokohama may be small—we believe it consists of not more than two or three persons—but it is certainly patriotic for it sent on Saturday the following telegram, part of which we give in English; "To His Majesty the King, Christiania: God Bless the King and the Royal House. Onsker hans Mestest en Velsignelsesrigt Regjering."

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

Among the many subjects which are engaging the attention of Protestant churches the entire independence and self-support of these bodies are undoubtedly of primary importance. In connection with this the Fukui Shimpō is of opinion that the resolutions passed at the General Conference held by the Nihon Kirisutokiyōkai in October last were very significant. Commenting on this subject this Presbyterian organ says: In every direction there are signs that the nation is entering on a new era of development and it would ill become the Christian Church to be left behind in the race. Realizing this, the members of our General Conference passed resolutions that will render the nineteenth conference of our church memorable in history. In reference to the independence of church bodies, it was decided that no church which proved itself unequal to the task of conducting religious services and carrying on mission work unaided by foreign funds should be regarded as a properly constituted church. A resolution to this effect was brought before last year's conference, but failed to pass. This year it passed almost unanimously. This shows that we are actuated by a new spirit. In relation to the attitude of Japanese churches to foreign missions, eight years ago it was decided that public services should be carried on by native pastors without the aid of foreign missionaries. But this practice has not been strictly adhered to. Henceforth the relations of the native churches to foreign missionaries will be clearly defined. There is to be no co-operation between foreign missions and native churches.* The Kumiai-kyōkai purposes to discuss this question at its next General Conference. . . . The estimate for the year of the Dendō-kyoku (Evangelistic Bureau) decided on at the Conference amounts to 10,000 yen, an inadequate sum considering all the openings for mission work in Korea and Manchuria, but still, seeing that this bureau has only been in existence 10 years affording cause for gratitude.

The Kirisutokiyō Sekai expresses great gratification at the results of the General Conference held in Tōkyō by the Kumiai-kyōkai on Oct. 18th and following days. The principal questions dealt with were the independence of churches and their relation to foreign missions and certain matters concerning the Dōshisha School of Divinity. It is stated that there are some 50 churches which are still receiving help from foreign mission funds. Steps are being taken to enable these churches to do without this help. They are given two years within which to make themselves independent. Should some of them be unable to accomplish this they will come under the control of the Japanese Dendōkyōkai. Thus in name and reality it is considered that all Japanese Congregational churches will become independent and self-supporting two years hence. The need of money for urgent evangelistic work being felt, the sum of eight hundred yen was immediately subscribed at the Conference. The Kirisutokiyō Sekai writes with regret of the action taken by the conference in reference to the Dōshisha Divinity Hall. Objection was taken to the present superintendent (ryū) and the Conference decided that it was undesirable for the Kumiai-kyōkai to retain its connection with this officer. It was equivalent to passing a vote of want of confidence in the present management of the Theological College. That at a time when the Dōshisha is sadly in need of friends, when many who once favoured it have begun to regard its downfall with indifference, the Kumiai-kyōkai should in the manner above described give the institution the cold shoulder is deeply to be deplored. The management of the institution can surely be placed in other hands if those now at the head of affairs fail to give satisfaction to the Kumiai-kyōkai. This need not be allowed to bring about a separation between our Church and an institution with which it has been associated so long.

* The report of the Committee of five appointed to investigate this subject was adopted with slight verbal corrections. The resolution passed reads thus:—Nihon Kirisutokiyōkai to gaikoku Mission no aidani hyōryoku no jison sesaru koto wa sude ni Meiji 30 nen no Daikai ni oite akiraka ni mitometau tokoro ni shite, jibai go mo aratamaru tokoro naku, kyōryoku wa mikomi naki mono to hanjite su. "That there is no real co-operation between the Kirisutokiyōkai and the various Missions was made quite clear at our General Conference in 1897. Since then no change whatever has been made. We have no intention to co-operate in future."

While not possessing a tenth part of the oratorical power of Lord Rosebery, Count Okuma resembles this talented and scholarly English nobleman in the ease with which he makes suitable public speeches to audiences that have little in common with each other. On the 24th of October last Count Okuma delivered an address to the members of the Kumiai-kyōkai General Conference at a garden party given for them which is of considerable interest. A full report of it appears in the Kirisutokiyō Sekai, of which we furnish the following epitome:—It gives me great pleasure to meet so many workers in the spiritual world as are here to-day. For one like myself who has no religion to talk to religious people like you is no easy task. I am very much ashamed of the fact that I have no religion, but it is the result of unavoidable circumstances. I am a product of the age in which I have lived. No one but a genius is able to overcome the consequences of his environment. Though having nothing that can be called religion, I have notions in reference to a Power that is above us. Many of these I picked up in my younger days by reading Dutch books and by the study of Physics. I have three great pleasures in life, that is, there are three things which interest me very much. (1) I am greatly interested in politics. This was the result of my bringing up. From the age of 15 I began earnestly to look into foreign literature, but as a consequence of my surroundings I became in early days one of those stalwart young men called sōshi and a vehement advocate of an anti-foreign policy. I wasted my youth in political agitation. (2) I am very fond of nature—not of such descriptions of nature as we find in fine prose and in poetry, but of nature itself as seen in the vegetable world. Floriculture has always had attractions for me, as it had for my father, who used to grow a number of flowers for presentation at temples on special occasions. (3) I am greatly interested in education. This originally was awakened by the regret I felt that my studies were so neglected in youth. What I had not been able to get I determined to give to others, and so early in the Meiji era I founded the school with which you are all acquainted and employed the late Dr. Verbeck as one of the first teachers. The three interests alluded to above dove-tail each other in many ways in my daily life. The culture of flowers and vegetables teaches me much about the training of young men. Politics, nature, and education are the three absorbing interests of my life. As regards religion it is my opinion that it can never flourish in a country that is badly governed. Religious liberty is invariably associated with wise government. There are only two countries in the world where people enjoy religious liberty, America and England (Konnichi no sekai ni shinsei naru shūkyō jiyū no okonawarete oru wa tada Beikoku to Nihon nomi de aru)*. The progress of religion and political development go hand in hand. . . . There is something I wish specially to say to you. It is this: bring your religion down to the level of ordinary people. There is a danger of religion becoming too philosophical, too mystical, too abstruse for ordinary comprehension. In both religion and morality theory and practice are often far apart from each other. Look at China. For thousands of years her sages have done nothing but preach a fine moral code, but nevertheless the whole nation has been corrupt. The teaching of China's sages is above the heads of the masses. So is it with much of the religion that is taught in the world. I am not for condemning all pleasures. They are a necessity to man's growth and development.

Commenting on the movement of the Protestant

* This is of course incorrect.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

Churches towards greater independence, under the title of Japonicized Christianity the Kōye (Roman Catholic) says, that as a result of the war there should be a general awakening in the nation, a desire to take on its shoulders new responsibilities and that this sentiment should extend to the religious world is but natural. The increased desire for financial independence and for independence in the control of Church affairs shown by Protestants is one with which we can sympathize. But there are many among them who go farther than this and claim the right to a free choice of the doctrines they shall accept. There in our opinion they go too far. Not but that this is the logical outcome of the Protestant principle of free interpretation of the Bible. In all ages Protestants have claimed this right and have exercised it, resulting in endless diversity of teaching, in the modification of the creed to suit various ages and various nations. Hence there is no adequate reason from a Protestant point of view why Japanese Christians should accept the interpretation given to the Bible by European and American divines. They have the right to adapt the faith to the age in which we live and to the tastes of the nation. By doing this they will no doubt render the creed more attractive to a large number of Japanese. From the Protestant point of view no logical objection can be taken to this. But according to our view no such liberty can be taken with the religion that has come to us by means of a Divine Revelation. The articles of belief in a religion are of its very essence and do not admit of alteration. Christianity is not a narrow national creed, but a universal religion. So that to speak of a Japonicized Christianity is a contradiction in terms. The cardinal doctrines of Christianity are the same in all countries. The truths of our religion are as little subject to national influences as the axioms of mathematics and science.

The ground taken by Roman Catholics on this subject being quite familiar to our readers we need not pursue the subject further.

The Kōye furnishes a very good account of an attempt recently made by the Shinbukkō to collect the views of a number of thinkers on the possibility of a future life. This kind of thing is getting to be rather popular in Japan. But whether it pays for the trouble involved is rather doubtful. It usually happens that many people who are well qualified to express an opinion on the subject under investigation do not take the trouble to write at all. The editor of the Shinbukkō and his associates belonging to the Dōshikai some months ago sent out letters to a large number of noted scholars, educationists, literary men and religious teachers asking for an expression of opinion on the existence or non-existence of a future life (Raise no Umi) (有無). They received 127 answers. These were published as a supplement to a commemorative number of the Shinbukkō; that magazine having just celebrated the sixth anniversary of its establishment, and they have since been issued in book form at 20 sen a copy. The recipients of the application forwarded were requested to state (1) Whether there is any future life or not; (2) The reasons for giving an affirmative or a negative answer to the above question. (3) The character of the future life in which the writer believes. Almost every conceivable kind of answer seems to have been sent in. Some are scornfully flippant or utterly indifferent, while others turn the whole thing into a joke. But there are some very serious answers also. Some are only a few lines in length; while others extend to over 10 pages. Among the 127 replies some are nothing more than acknowledgments of the receipt of the application and excuses for not replying at all. Others express the inability of the writers to treat such a difficult subject, having never given any attention to it. Others go as far as to say that no satisfactory answer to the questions put by the Shinbukkō can ever be given by anybody, and that it was a big piece of folly on the part of this organ to propound such silly questions. Some quote Confucius' remark: Imada sei wo shiranu; izukunzo shi wo shiran ya? (Not yet knowing life, how can we know death?). Dr. Anezaki says that nothing can be added to what sages and holy men have written on this subject. That no new views of any value are obtainable. Hence he begs respectfully to decline to answer the questions put. Some of the correspondents say that not having crossed to the other world, they know nothing about it. To others the future life appears as a mere dream on the reality of which no reliance can be placed. Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō's answer is very indecisive: Imi ni yotte wa ari; imi ni yotte wa nashi (In some senses there is a future life in other senses none.) Mr. Ishiguro Chūtoku says, "Without regard to whether there is a future life or not, I do what is good and avoid what is evil. So that if there should be a future life I steadfastly believe no harm will come to me. (Waruki me ni auimaji to kakushin itashi)."

The above answers neither decide the question one way nor the other. Among those who assert that there is no future life there are some who, like Dr. Tomizu, thrust the burden of proof on the questioners thus: "If you are of opinion that there is a future life, I should be glad to examine the proofs thereof that you are able to produce." But Dr. Katō Hiroyuki boldly asserts: "We cannot think that there is any future life; as science has furnished no proof of its existence." There are some who assert that science furnishes abundant proof that there is no future life. Mr. Shimoda, B.A., says:—"There is no energy apart from matter and no matter separate from energy." Mr. Maruyama Tsūichi says:—"The state of our consciousness is dependent on the state of the body, and so it follows that with bodily collapse will come the loss of consciousness." There are some who object to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. These may be classed with those who deny that there is a future life. Among those who affirm their belief in a future life there is a great diversity in the meaning attached to the term "future life." Some interpret it to mean merely future existence in this life and affirm in joke that they believe that they will go on living for a long time yet. Others apply the term "future life" to the perpetuity of the race and say they believe in that, while knowing that individuals will be all annihilated at death. While others affirm that though man dies, the results of his life remain in the world, and so he has a future life. The noted Buddhist Mr. Shimaji Mokurai says:—"The law of cause and effect is perpetually working, extending over the three worlds (past, present and future). Because there has been a past there is a present, and because there is a present that there will be a future is quite certain, requiring no noisy arguments to demonstrate it." Mr. Nakajima Tokuzō, who has made a special study of Ethics, writes:—"I believe in my immortality in as far as my existence is connected with that of the great Ego." There are some Christians like Mr. Shimada Saburō, Mr. Saji Jitsunen and Mr. Kinoshita Nawoe who reply very simply that they steadfastly believe in the individual future existence of the soul, without stating any reasons for this belief; while others honestly say that they believe in the immortality of the soul because they have been told by religious teachers that they should do so, but are unable to adduce any scientific or logical proof in support of their belief. Some say they believe it because it is comforting; others as a necessary postulate of their ethical creed, and others affirm that as religion is a necessity to mankind so the belief in a future life is a necessity to religion. There are not a few writers like Mr. Ebina Danjō, Mr. Honda and Masuji, Mr. Takaki Jintarō, who found their belief in a future life on the rational and emotional aspirations of mankind, on the justice and love of God, on the necessity of Divine judgment on the actions of men and on the indestructibility of molecules (bushitsu no genshi).^{*} It will be seen from the above epitome how wide is the difference of opinion on the subject of a future life. The opinions as set down in the Shinbukkō pamphlet are like a piece of elaborate mosaic in which the inlaid parts have no affinity with each other.* But the collection made, being a correct representation of the state of opinion in Japan to-day on the subject of a future life, it possesses considerable value.

The Koye furnishes a very discerning and from its own point of view a very fair-minded review of the opinions expressed in the following tones:—To some the views expressed by our leading men on the subject of the future life may give pleasure, but we must confess that to us they appear to reveal a condition of things in the world of thought that is quite pitiful. In the first place we are grieved to observe the flippancy with which the subject is treated by men whose names are well known in the literary or scientific world. The shallowness of some of their statements is astonishing. Many writers seem to delight in showing the supreme indifference with which they regard a great religious question like that of the future life. Indifference to such subjects they take to be a sign of superiority of intelligence, to be a proof that they have freed themselves from the trammels of superstition. That this should be the attitude of our learned men to the deeper questions of life is to us a cause of deep regret. Instead of this attitude being a subject for boasting, it is something to be ashamed of. Instead of its being manly to cultivate this state of mind, it is distinctly childish. Children only live in the present and never trouble themselves about the future. Forethought for the distant future is one of the characteristics of a properly developed mind. For travellers like ourselves not to ask whether we are going appears to us the height of thoughtlessness. Among all the questions that concern us as human beings is there any at all comparable in importance to this one that concerns a future life? We have in this country the anomaly of a set of scholars treating with supreme nonchalance a belief which in all ages and in all countries has been accepted by the majority of mankind. By our savants the subject of a future life is dismissed as a matter of no personal concern to them (saigan no kuwasai, a fire on the opposite bank of the river). The plea of some that they avoid the subject because it is too complicated or too difficult for them cannot be allowed. The excuse of others that in past time opinion has always been divided on this subject, some affirming there is a future life and others that there is not, and that hence no satisfactory decision on the question is possible only shows how little interest such persons take in finding out what is the truth on this subject. To say that the future life is incapable of being proved to exist because science, which deals exclusively with the material world, has not furnished any evidence of its existence, as Dr. Katō did, or to cite the law of the world of matter as a proof that there can be no immortality of the spirit, as another writer did, shows confusion of thought. The psychological arguments that are adduced against the notion that there can be a future life are undoubtedly the strongest of all adducible arguments; though they do not seem to us conclusive. It is true that all the operations of the mind with which we are acquainted, perception, memory, imagination, are all intimately connected with a bodily nervous system and that physical changes of every kind affect the mind more or less. But there are times when the mind seems to be working quite independently of the body, leading us to infer that the one may not be solely dependent on the other. There are occasions when the mind shows its superiority to the body, when it enables us to do things from which flesh and blood shrink and to refrain from things to which animal passion impels us. In these cases it seems to establish for itself a kind of separate identity, to occupy a place outside the organization in which it is temporarily tabernacled. Then there is the argument founded on the non-material constituents of the soul. The soul is a spiritual entity that is not subject to the law of decay that governs matter. To say that it cannot exist except in conjunction with the living human frame is to misconceive of the essential nature of the soul. If the soul has the power of existing and working apart from the body now, there is no reason for thinking that death will destroy it. From our experience in this world and from reason the existence of the soul and its activity after death may be inferred.^{*} The subject of the existence of the soul after death and that of the state in which it will exist must be kept quite separate. While being able to prove by means of psychology and logic that the spirit will go on existing after death, we cannot by these means decide on the form which it will take when disembodied. Of course there are some religious teachers who hold that the scientific and philosophical arguments adduced to prove a future life are altogether inconclusive, and that even to prove the future existence of the soul we must fall back on revelation. We do not share this opinion. It concedes too much to the agnostic and the mystic. One thing is quite certain and that is that nobody can prove from psychology or from science the non-existence of the soul after death. What evidence is furnished from these sources favours the survival of the spirit after death. This being so, the off-hand manner in which so many of our scholars have dismissed the whole subject as unworthy of serious discussion is much to be deplored.

The Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) in an article on Buddhism and the Russian Prisoners says:—The manner in which some 100,000 Russian prisoners have been treated by the Japanese, a non-Christian people, in this country has been a great surprise to these prisoners and to the outside world. But some people have failed to take notice of the fact that in some cases Buddhist priests have figured conspicuously among those who have acted kindly to the strangers. Buddhist temples have been loaned for the accommodation of prisoners and priests have repeatedly interested themselves in their welfare. For this we desire to express our gratitude. It is known to readers of history that in past ages in India, China and Japan, Buddhists either themselves persecuted or instigated others to persecute Christians solely on account of religious prejudice and hatred, but modern Buddhism has no sympathy with such methods of procedure. Some people may say that since the loan of temples for the use of prisoners was ordered by the Government it is no credit to the Buddhists that they devoted their buildings to the shelter of Christians. They could not have acted otherwise. To this we reply that had they been actuated by strong religious prejudice, they might have opposed the Government's action in various ways and have rendered the prisoners very uncomfortable and many disputes between the prisoners and the priests might have occurred. But though temples have been used in all parts of the country, we believe that there is not one single case where there has been any unpleasantness between Buddhists and their Christian guests—all has been peace and harmony. This is certainly very creditable to the professors of Buddhism. But modern Buddhism has been permeated with the spirit of modern civilisation. We have no doubt that the generous treatment accorded to men of an alien faith could be justified by quotations from Buddhist writings, but it is plain that it is the spirit of the age rather than the teaching of their holy men that has incited modern Buddhists to act in a Christian manner. There seem to be many evidences to show that the old enmity between Buddhists and Christians is dying out and that the time has come for the professors of the two creeds to act together in all charitable undertakings. Buddhism is regarded by Bishop Nicolai as a religion well adapted to prepare the way for Christianity. Of all the many surprises that this war has furnished the attitude of Buddhism to our Christian prisoners is in many respects most remarkable, and it cannot but have made a deep impression on the men who were the recipients of Buddhist hospitality.

In an article entitled Defects in the Modern

World of Thought, the Seikyō Shimpō says that the present age is remarkable for its materialism, for its lack of an ideal, for its failure to realize the significance and the true dignity of human life. It is on this account that the press is wont to praise or to give undue publicity to acts which, judged by anything like a high standard of morality ought to be unequivocally condemned. The great scepticism of the present age is the result of the writings of certain scientists and philosophers in the nineteenth century. These writers were not ultra-materialists by any means. In their opposition to Christianity they drew arguments from history, and from the spiritual world, as well as from the laws that govern matter. Hence the influence they wielded.

The Rikugō Zasshi, in an article entitled Shūkyōkai no Konjaku (The Religious World as it was and as it is), contends that religious thought today is all in the direction of greater union between the creeds. There is manifest a great desire to appreciate what is good in alien creeds. Christ and Shaka are both recognized as great men. Christianity and Buddhism are both regarded as engaged in the reform of mankind, as endeavouring to set before men and women an ideal life which is in every way more noble than the life each one is actually living. To sink minor differences and fall back on the great religious and ethical truths on which there is substantial agreement—this seems to be the spirit of the modern religious world, and lovers of real religion can not but rejoice that it is so.

One cannot but admire the persistency with which the editor of the Gokyo, Dr. Takagi, discusses the indispensableness of certain reforms in the Methodist Church to which he belongs. One of the chief of these is the better education of Japanese pastors and other workers. In an article on this subject which lies before us the Gokyo urges the necessity of sending some of the brightest of the theological students to America for further education. It observes that most of the Methodist churches in Japan are so busily engaged in evangelistic work that they are apt to overlook the fact that there are very few men in the ranks of Christian workers who are at all well acquainted with modern thought. On this account their preaching is out of touch with the age in which we live, says the Gokyo. The advance that modern Japan has made in learning is such that preachers who 30 years ago might have been listened to with pleasure now fail to attract audiences by the utterance of mere commonplaces. In all other lines of modern Japanese life it is realised that our young men in order to become thoroughly proficient should wherever possible be sent to the great fountain-heads of knowledge in foreign lands. Though knowledge is by no means everything in religion, unless a pastor possesses it his sphere of usefulness becomes very limited. He cannot gain the respect of the highly educated. We do not say that there are no pastors among us who are well versed in modern learning, but they are painfully few, and if we go on year after year without making any attempt to add to their number we shall be left behind as a church by more enterprising bodies. There are some who oppose the notion of sending young men abroad to be educated because, they say that such men become dissatisfied with the salaries they receive here on their return, and then leave the ministry for other callings. But this objection should not be allowed to stand in the way of the higher education of the pastors. We have always maintained that our workers are underpaid. It is not only the men who have been abroad who complain of this, men who have lived in Japan all their lives constantly tell us how difficult it is for them to live as they wish to on their present salaries.

But there is another way of raising our workers to a higher status as regards learning. We ought to do for our pastors what is being done so well for the teachers of primary schools all over the country. These men are gathered together in Kōshūkai and regularly instructed in subjects with which they are but slightly acquainted. This gives an impetus to their private studies and constitutes a higher education in itself. Now our Church could insist on the attendance of pastors at a series of lectures delivered once or twice every year by competent men. Graduation at our Theological College no more equips a man for all the work he has to do as a pastor than graduation at a Normal School qualifies a man to act as a thoroughly efficient teacher at a Shōgakkō (Primary School). And yet we make no attempt to remedy the deficient education of our workers. There are held in the course of the year certain meetings of Christian workers but at these meetings Church business or arrangements for preaching services and the like are exclusively discussed, and there is no attempt made to impart knowledge to the workers. Hence it is that many of our Christian workers are in education and intelligence inferior to Primary School teachers (Karera wa konnichi no Shōgakkō kyōin ni mo otaru shidai nite, kore too kyōkūsen mado no koto wa totei omoi mo yorataru koto narubeshi.) We trust that these workers themselves will soon wake up to the fact of their deficiencies and that the churches will furnish them with suitable means for obtaining the knowledge a lack of which constitutes a perpetual hindrance to their Christian work.

ALLIANCE FRANCAISE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual general meeting of the Alliance Française was held at Van Schaick Hall on Monday at 5 p.m. and evoked considerable interest among the members. The chair was occupied by the President, Mr. J. de Cuers de Cogolin.

The first business of the meeting was to receive the President's report. He said they had to congratulate themselves on their two years of existence because as in the case of everything new they had difficulties to encounter in the beginning. For this reason they were to be congratulated on having surmounted their initial obstacles. It was now impossible for anyone to question the success of the society in Yokohama. Their members had increased almost daily, without distinction of nationality, and all worked together with the utmost good-will, which was the best encouragement to those whom they entrusted with the conduct of the society's affairs. To-day the Committee retired and wished to express its cordial thanks to the members in connection with the year's work. For himself his duties were latterly very light as he was merely at the helm of a boat that steered itself. It was not easy in a town like Yokohama, where all were business men, to find lecturers; at the outset they expected to have some war-correspondents but eventually they decided that it would be better to confine themselves to literary subjects. Now that the war was over they might expect a larger field. The President passed in review the various lectures of the past year and said he thought he should specially mention that of Father Peri who spoke on the Russo-Japanese War, poets and soldiers, and whose lecture was such a success, not only when read by him, but afterwards when published in French in the Melange of Tokyo, and in the pamphlet edited by the Eastern World; and in English in the perfect translation of Mr. Cyril Allen in the Japan Gazette. They had good promise for the coming year, many lecturers being in view. Up to the present the musical part of the proceedings had been inopportune, and they mostly had found themselves indebted to the kindness of members who had sung and played at short notice, but this year Mr. Rudolf Schmidt had consented to take charge of the arrangements and from next meeting they would have proper programmes combined with excellent music. The library had worked satisfactorily and members seemed to like the choice of books and periodicals made by the Committee. A new order had gone forward and the works might be expected here soon. At present there was no catalogue of the library but one of the members, M. Baret, had kindly consented to prepare one and have it printed. It was thought to open the library all the afternoon and to make necessary arrangements to enable members to go to the rooms and read the books there instead of having to take them away. By the kindness of the French Consul, M. Steenackers, they were accorded accommodation at the Consulate, but some time must elapse before their arrangements as to the future were completed. Personally the President regarded himself as a roi faineant, but said the members must sincerely thank M. R. Jamin, the Hon. Secretary-Treasurer, for the great trouble he had taken in the active work of the society. They had to thank the Minister, M. J. Harmand, for the interest he took in their proceedings and they knew that if in consequence of other engagements he could not himself be present at their meetings he was always represented. He should be very forgetful of the fourth power, the Yokohama press, if he did not acknowledge their kindness in publishing intimations of their meetings and reports of their proceedings. If he had to mention all the members who had assisted them he would have to name all present, for it was their kind help that gave the society its raison d'être and it was because of that kindness that the society had lived and was now living with all promise of prosperity (Applause.)

The following accounts presented by the Hon. Secretary-Treasurer were, with the President's report, unanimously adopted:—

The following gentlemen were elected as officers and committee of the Alliance Française for the coming year: President, M. J. de Cuers de Cogolin; Vice-President, M. M. J. Dayet; Secretary-Treasurer, M. R. Jamin; and Messrs. L. Mottet, P. Dourille, G. Gilbert, and A. Coxe.

A delightful contribution to the entertainment of the evening was made by Mrs. Henry Overstreet Bisset, who sang the following:—

- La Vivandière (Benjamin Godard) couplets de Marion.
- Le Roi des Aulnes (F. Schubert).
- Cavalleria Rusticana, (P. Mascagni) Romance de Santuzza.

The possessor of a most charming voice, this lady was a most welcome presence at the meeting, and the deepest regret was felt and expressed that she departs from Yokohama within a short space of time.

An interesting paper was read in the course of the afternoon by M. R. Jamin on "Le Cid de Corneille."

TRAGEDIES.

T. Uyemara (25) a workman, employed at the Idzumi Dyeing Factory, Honjo, attempted to murder a girl, Ko Tanisawa (24) by name, in the Wakamatsu-Ro, Susaki, Tokyo, on the evening of Nov. 26th, inflicting severe injuries on her head, face, and hands with a large knife. The man afterwards committed suicide by stabbing himself in the throat and breast with the same weapon. The woman was removed to the Uyeda Hospital near by. There is no report as to the cause.

A telegram says that K. Yoneda, a merchant at Awamori, murdered his wife on Nov. 26th. He was subsequently arrested. Jealousy is reported to be the cause.

THANKSGIVING.

The Harvest Thanksgiving services at Christ Church, Yokohama, on Sunday drew large congregations. The church was decorated with the kindly fruits of the earth; the hymns associated with harvest were sung; a special Te Deum was chanted; and the Rev. Geo. Wallace, of Tokyo, preached at the morning service a most acceptable sermon. In the evening the new electric light installation was used for the first time. It is a decided improvement and the taste displayed by the Incumbent, the Rev. W. P. G. Field, in the selection of the iron work of the fittings won universal commendation.

Divine Service was held in the Union Church on Thursday morning, a fair proportion of the American community, including the Consul-General and his family, being present. Rev. E. S. Booth, assisted by Rev. Dr. Dearing, conducted the service, the sermon being preached by Rev. Dr. Bennett, who chose for his text, "O that men would praise the Lord for His goodness and His wonderful works to the children of men." After eloquently recounting some of the leading blessings, international, political, and commercial, which had recently fallen to the lot of the American republic, the learned preacher forcefully pointed out those features of weakness against which the nation should be guarded, and closed his address by earnestly expressing the hope that the political reformation which had commenced in Philadelphia, and kindred movements in other cities, might extend their influence until the whole nation united in progress toward higher social and political life.

An efficient and well-balanced choir led the music of the service very acceptably, the rendering of the Anthem "Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness" being especially bright and appropriate.

The Offertory was on behalf of the Seamen's Mission.

FOOTBALL.

Enthusiasm is running so high this season among the football players of the Y.C. & A.C. that it was possible on Saturday to bring off two games under Association rules. The first game was played by teams chosen from among the newer players with a few of the old hands. The teams were:—

WHITES.		COLOURS.
S. R. Ford (Capt.)	For-wards	L. Stornebrink	For-wards
C. von Fallot		B. C. Foster (Capt.)
O. White		B. C. Lambert
G. B. Valentine		V. A. Hearne
G. Russell		W. Graham
W. D. Cameron	Halves	L. Wilson	Halves
A. W. Talbot		D. Neville
F. E. Bunting		J. Figuieredo
W. H. Worden		H. S. Beil
A. N. Oulter		A. P. Layer
Momban	Goal	Momban	Goal

Whites quickly proved themselves the better team and won by six goals to one. Four of their goals were scored by Worden and two by van Smith. The goal for the losers was put through by Stornebrink.

The teams for the second game were:—

J. E. Drummond	For-wards	J. F. Dixon	For-wards
W. B. White		O. Strome
S. R. Clarke		J. E. Moss (Capt.)
H. W. Kilby (Capt.)		N. H. McDougall
E. M. Lambert		J. M. Mollison
T. W. Kilby	Halves	W. B. Mason	Halves
W. J. White		G. N. Fairhurst
D. Weed		D. Drummond
A. W. S. Austen		W. S. Moss
A. E. Cooper		W. E. T. Dismold
F. J. Lias	Goal	E. Powys, Jr.	Goal

This was an excellent game. Colours showed the best combination among the forwards. They worked the ball up steadily time after time and taxed the strong defence to the utmost, and finally won out by four goals to one. The game was far more even than the score suggests, particularly towards the close, when Whites played up well and were several times almost on the point of scoring. Mollison, Dixon (2) and McDougall scored for Colours and H. Kilby for Whites.

THE LAW COURTS.

A POLICEMAN SENTENCED.

K. Uchida, a policeman of the Shitaya station, Tokyo, who was charged with having taken a bribe of five yen from a man who was arrested on suspicion of theft, was sentenced on Nov. 27th in the Tokyo District Court to two months' imprisonment with hard labour.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCE.

In connexion with the Tokyo trouble on Sept. 5th, seven policemen of the various stations were examined by Judge Nakagawa on Nov. 26th and 27th in the District Court. The examination of Mr. H. Kono and five other leading politicians is almost concluded. The charge against them is reported to be that though the mass-meeting in the Hibiya Park was prohibited by the Metropolitan Police nevertheless Mr. Kono and five others induced a great number of men to meet in the park. The promoters consequently are charged with having instigated the disturbance and with having participated in the doings of the mob.

BARON VON DITTON.

The preliminary examination of Baron von Ditton, of Denmark, is now almost concluded in the Yokohama District Court. The decision will be given within a few days.

It may be remembered that on September 12th, according to the police report he arrived in Yokohama from Shanghai and put up at the Grand Hotel. He stayed there till the 28th of the same month. During that period, he is alleged to have obtained several articles from foreign and Japanese merchants by fraud and he succeeded in getting yen 520 from an American at No. 100 Bluff, after which he absconded. He was arrested on Oct. 26th by the Kagachō police on his return from Miyashita.

ELECTRIC RAILWAY CASE.

A jirikisha coolie named M. Oshima, living at Reiganjima, Kyobashi, Tokyo, has lodged a claim of fifteen thousand yen in the Tokyo District Court against the Shigai Electric Railway Company. According to the petition Ichi (7), the eldest daughter of the plaintiff, was run over by a car of the defendant company which took off both her feet. The defendants declined to pay any compensation with the exception of the surgical expenses, which amounted to thirty-five yen.

In connection with this case, Judge Sakurai and the Public Procurator in company with Professor Arakawa of the Engineering College, on Nov. 29th, took measures to ascertain the speed of the cars at Shiwocho, Reiganjima and Sukiya-bashi. It was found that in the stopping of the cars there was great irregularity.

Thirteen thousand yen of the amount claimed is by way of pension and two thousand yen for compensation to the sufferer.

TWO POLICEMEN SENTENCED.

In the Tokyo Appeal Court, sentence was passed on Nov. 29th on Y. Osono and M. Sakamoto two ex-policemen of the Shiba Station who were charged with having tortured R. Higuchi, a second-hand goods dealer. Osono was punished with four months' imprisonment at hard labour and a fine of five yen, and Sakamoto with twenty-five days' imprisonment with hard labour and a fine of three yen.

PLAGUE.

The Governor of Hyogo prefecture wired on Nov. 24th to the Home Office that three fresh cases of bubonic plague had appeared in the village of Fukiai.

The Governor of Hyogo prefecture wired on Nov. 26th to the Home Office that a fresh case of bubonic plague had appeared in Kano-machi, Kobe, the patient being a man. Since the first case which took place on Nov. 9th, up to the present the patients number twenty-four.

An Osaka telegram says that on Nov. 26th a case of plague was reported in South Horii-cho, west urban district. The patient who is a woman, Tame (52) by name, the wife of a coolie, died the same night.

In connexion with the prevalence of plague in Kobe and Osaka, Governor Suifu of Kanagawa Prefecture, issued an urgent notification on Nov. 28th warning the public to take precautions to avert infection from the disease.

Another plague case has been reported in Kobe.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Crown Prince returned on Nov. 30th from Yamada, arriving at Shinbashi at 5.45 p.m. He passed Hiranuma railway station at 5 p.m. Officials of the local government offices and representatives of various public bodies were present on the platform as His Highness passed.

The following transports have been released:—Taito, Yeko, Kishiyo, Kisakata, Hiroshima, Nihyuri, Fukuoka, Yamaguchi, Sugiyama, Yeijo, Ujina Kokura, Taikosan and Hisen. Recently, at the Saseho Naval Station the Takasaki, Wakamiya, and Yamamoto were employed as transports.

A Saseho telegram says that the petitions of the owner of the French steamer Quandnam (1,431 tons) and the consignees of her cargo asking for her release were dismissed on Nov. 28th by the Saseho Prize Court. This ship was captured on May 16th by the converted cruiser Bingo Maru in the neighbourhood of the Pescadores.

Two foreigners, alleged to be Frenchmen, members of the crew of the French mail steamer Tonkin, were arrested on the night of Nov. 24th by the Isezaki-cho Police, Yokohama, and the following day were removed to the Yokohama District Court. As to the charge against them, it is reported by the police that they stole two pieces of silk crape from the shop of M. Kato, a silk and lacquered goods dealer in Sakai-cho, and tried to steal two from the shops of K. Nagasawa, a dealer in Sumiyoshi-cho, Shichome.

A conference of Chinese and American business men, on the boycott, opened at Canton on the 13th. There were present: Mr. D. H. Cameron (chairman), Messrs. B. E. Richardson, John Bolles, A. Harriman, E. C. Gillon, W. S. Allen, Hornby, and Dr. Shelby, Mr. Poon Kingman (chairman) and over a hundred Chinese merchants. Late arrivals were unable to get in, so crowded was the Hall. Mr. Richardson delivered a speech setting forth the American side and some discussion followed. The meeting adjourned to the following day.

Early on the morning of Nov. 29th, a man armed with a sword broke into the house of A. Tokuo, a pawn-broker in Motomachi, Kanagawa, but the occupants, making loud outcries, the intruder ran off. Later, the house of S. Koiso, another pawn broker in Miyama-cho, was entered by an armed man. Koiso attacked the intruder with a sword and inflicted a severe injury on his right arm, and then gave him to the police. The man, whose name is G. Fujinami (21), confessed at the police office that he had taken part in various robberies which have been reported during the past four or five days.

Since the review at Yokohama, the following alterations have been made as to flagships:—1st Squadron: Admiral Togo, Asahi; Vice-Admiral Shimamura, Iwate; and Squadron: Vice-Admiral Kaminura, Idzumi; Vice-Admiral Uryu, Otoha; Rear-Admiral Ogura, Nanbu; 3rd Squadron: Vice-Admiral Kataoka, Yakumo; Vice-Admiral Togo (Masamichi) Shikishima; Rear-Admiral Yamada, Kasuga; 4th Squadron: Vice-Admiral Dewa, Iki (formerly the Appurau); Rear-Admiral Taketomi, Idzumi; and Rear-Admiral Nakao, Okinoshima (formerly the Nicholai II). Among the flag ships, the Nanbu is now at Yokohama and the Asahi at Shinagawa.

Tokyo, 27th November, 1905.

The report further shows that the Company's fleet numbers 73 steamers having an aggregate displacement of 250,905 tons, and that 9 steamers and 39 tugs and launches are building, which will raise the displacement to 273,068 tons.

BUSINESS REPORT.

In the second semi-annual term of the Company's 20th fiscal year, that is to say from April 1 to September 30 this year, the Company's steamers in the military transport service were still busily engaged in connexion with the war, and all the distant services, except the American line, remained suspended. On the Oriental and domestic lines, the regular services, however, were maintained with a small number of the Company's steamers, which had not been taken into the Government service, and with chartered steamers. When our control of the sea had been assured by the naval victory of May last in the Sea of Japan, the Company at once revived the services in neighbouring waters and inaugurated a few new lines. The Company's chartered steamers at the end of the term number 32, and represent 72,000 tons in displacement.

Domestic Coasting Services.—The domestic trade prospered, owing to the continuous victories of our army and navy, and a large amount of freight was obtainable at every port, in spite of the poor fishing season in Hokkaido and the bad crop of rice this year. The transport of military freight was also of considerable volume. The majority of the Japanese steamers were still in military service and the number of the chartered foreign steamers kept decreasing, so that the Company was free from competition in its business. The freight carried by the Company showed an increase of 114,000 tons as compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year. After the occupation of Saghalien by our forces, the company tentatively dispatched a steamer to that island and afterwards opened a regular service between Korsakoff and Hakodate.

Oriental Services.—The prosperous condition of the trade with Chinese and Korean ports was maintained. In particular, on the Yokohama-Shanghai and Kobe-North China lines, on each of which three steamers were being run, the Company had to dispatch several additional steamers. In June, monthly services were opened between Osaka and Chinnampo, and between Yokohama and North China. The former service was suspended towards the close of the term, owing to the necessity of redistributing the fleet. The business of the Yokohama-North China line was not all that could be desired, and the Company intends to place an additional steamer on the run and make the service a fortnightly one, in order to develop the trade. In the beginning of July, the Company re-opened the Kobe-Vladivostok line as far as GenSan.

European Service.—The European service was not run by the Company's vessels but by six steamers under a special contract as in the preceding term, the Company undertaking simply to deal in passenger and freight traffic. A monthly service was thus maintained as well as relations with shippers. Of these steamers, three belonging to the Ocean Steamship Company were withdrawn from the service at the middle of the term, and since then the service has consisted of five vessels belonging to Messrs. Bucknall Bros. and one to Messrs. Charles Barry & Co. Owing to the abundant cargo in Europe awaiting transportation to the East, the Company chartered six other vessels for the single trip from Europe to Japan and two for use at home, besides concluding a contract with two other vessels.

American Service.—This service in ordinary times is run between Hongkong and Seattle once a fortnight by three steamers, in compliance with the Government ordinance, and by three steamers on the Company's own account. During the term under review, the Company suspended the service between Hongkong and Japan, and maintained the subsidized service between Japan and America by two steamers, Iyo Maru and Kanagawa Maru, which were dispatched about once a month. The service generally does but little business in summer. But in the term under review, the steamers carried a considerable amount of cargo, owing to the large demand for Japanese goods in America and to shipments of cotton from America.

Australian Line.—The Australian service was totally suspended during the term.

Bombay Line.—The service was totally suspended by the Company, and the transportation of cotton to Japan was carried on by the steamers of the P. & O. and other steamship companies, at a fixed rate of freightage, as in the preceding term. But after the middle of the term, the Company hired foreign steamers for four trips from Bombay to Japan for the conveyance of cotton.

The term of the Government order relating to the Hokkaido Coasting Service, included in the orders relating to the Domestic Coasting and Oriental Services, begun on October 1, 1900, expired with the business term under review, and in September last the Minister of Communications and the Governor of Hokkaido granted our Company another order relating to the transportation of mails, passengers and freights. The order on the whole is similar to its predecessor, but in such matters as the increase of the trips between the main island and Hokkaido and of the Nemuro lines, the Company's duties have been augmented.

In short, during the term under review, the passenger and freight traffic prospered in a remarkable degree, as the result of the victories won by our army and navy. Moreover, the Company have been taught by experience to use foreign steamers in an economical way, while on the other hand there were considerable receipts on account of the military transport service. The gross earnings of the Company during the term amounted to yen 11,807,803.40 and the total expenditure to yen 7,729,994.726, the balance being yen 4,077,808.664. From the balance, reserving 1,000,000 yen for the funds for replenishing the military transport fleet, yen 1,503,703.007 as reserves according to the Company's contract, and yen 49,285.31 towards the sinking funds for the premises, there remains a net profit of yen 1,524,820.384.

FIRES.

An official telegram reports that an outbreak of fire occurred at 3 a.m. on Nov. 25th at Nanao, near Kanazawa, Ishikawa prefecture, burning down about eight hundred houses, including the rural district office, a post office, the branch of the Tax Bureau, a female school and several banks. Several persons were killed or injured.

Fire broke out early on the morning of the 24th, Shinagawa-machi, Nihonbashi-ku, Tokyo, burning down twenty-one buildings including four warehouses. Three persons were killed and two firemen and some seven others were more or less injured. Gas was the cause.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION
ARMY DEPARTMENT.

The following is a report by Mr. V. W. Helm on his return from a one month's tour of investigation in Manchuria:

"I was able to visit the work at four points and consult fully with Mr. Otsuka, our Field Secretary, and other local secretaries. I found the work in its present activity, in the extent to which it has won the appreciation of common soldiers and confidence of highest officers, to have been far beyond even the high expectations with which I went to Manchuria. I had a full consultation with Mr. Otsuka as to policy for the next few months. At the time of my visit every plan was being made for the most expeditious return of the Japanese forces. It consequently seemed wise to us that the work for the next six months should be quite fully concentrated at the points where the largest number of returning soldiers can be touched. Consequently, of the seven points at present occupied, Hoojo and Eiryo are being closed and Yingkow will probably be closed. Port Arthur, where a considerable garrison will remain permanently, will continue undisturbed. We will concentrate all the strength possible upon Mukden and Liaoyang, at which places soldiers from the front will concentrate on the railroad and at Dalny, where soldiers will sail for Japan. In addition we will open a new work at Ryujutun or Talienwan, a point on the same bay just opposite Dalny. From these last two points practically the entire Japanese army will sail. The officers have not only welcomed our work for the returning soldiers but have urged its importance upon us and have suggested ways in which they can co-operate with us for the comfort and welfare of the men. Mr. Otsuka and I visited the commandants at Dalny and Ryujutun, who offered us every courtesy possible and enabled us to make the following observations:—

DALNY.—Here there are large barracks located together with a capacity of 21,000 men. These will be filled for the next six months with troops coming from the front and waiting from one to three days to embark upon transports. I understand that during this time, because of the many temptations in Dalny, these troops are not to be permitted to leave the barracks. The authorities have given our secretaries permission to visit the barracks day and night, with gramophones, stereopticons, writing materials, books, tracts, Scriptures, addresses, sermons and Bible instruction. When I left Dalny, Col. Hibiki, Quarter-Master General for the entire Manchurian armies, was searching for a house near these barracks in which our secretaries who have charge of this special work can reside.

RYUJUTUN.—There are in Ryujutun temporary quarters for 10,000 men, which will be used similarly to those in Dalny. These barracks are arranged on three sides of an open square, the fourth side of which is the bay. In the centre of this open square, on a piece of high land and just in front of the landing is a large frame building capable of holding a thousand men. It is the most conspicuously as well as conveniently located building in the place. This is the building selected by us out of the four or five offered to us by the authorities for our use. The commandant will put in a new floor and matting and some slight repairs. Our secretaries work here and had been assigned quarters not to the temporary barracks but in the large Chinese house which is to be used as quarters for generals and staff officers.

VICINITY OF DALNY AND RYUJUTUN.—A large number of returning troops will be kept in barracks at the foot of Nanshan hill and in the neighbouring city of Kinshu. A permanent work would be welcomed at this place had we the men and the means. But in lieu of that, secretaries resident at Dalny and Ryujutun will make frequent visits to the men in these neighbouring barracks.

MUKDEN.—Here a number of troops will gather from the front and take train. Our building and tent are located near the station and in the midst of the barracks used by these troops.

LIAOYANG.—While the Army is making arrangements to return the troops as speedily as possible, it will take six or eight months for the large majority to leave, and hence the army must make not only preparations for returning soldiers but winter preparations for the many thousands who must wait in this cold climate their turn to depart. Liaoyang is an important army commissariat headquarters; large detachments of men are coming here constantly from the front to secure supplies for their respective forces. The conspicuous and well located association building with its extensive athletic ground, is in the immediate neighbourhood of the barracks used by these men who constantly come from the front and return to the front. This will continue as an important work during the present period. There is here also a large and important field in visiting the hospitals. Liaoyang will also be used as one of the eating stations for returning troops. A large dining hall, capable of seating a thousand men has been erected near the station and several train loads of men will fill this repeatedly each day. The association has been asked by the officials to co-operate in providing helpful and wholesome entertainment and recreation to the soldiers during their one or more hours stay at this point.

You will readily see from the above that during the next six months we will be in a position to touch briefly but intimately over a half million men. Not only that, but they will be men who through our work of the last one and a half years will be prejudiced in favour of us and our message. We have in Manchuria now a force of one and a half dozen secretaries, competent, devoted and experienced who, while few in the face of such a big opportunity, will, however, do a magnificent work.

GRAND COMMEMORATION CHARITY CONCERT IN SENDAI.

On Wednesday evening, November 22nd, the largest and most successful concert ever arranged in Sendai was given in the large Sendai Theatre under the auspices of the North Japan College, when nearly three thousand persons listened to a long programme made up of twenty four numbers.

It would be impossible to bring out the merits of every selection on the programme, but in a general way we must say that all who took part did their very best. The chorus work by the Sendai Medical School, the Koto Gakko Musical Society and the North Japan College Glee Club showed up well and there was a marked improvement over previous work done by these musical associations.

The Sendai Military Band, under the direction of Rev. J. M. Stick, rendered two popular marches. This was undoubtedly the best brass band music ever produced in Sendai. The band deserves great praise.

All the vocal numbers went well. The duet by Mrs. Stick and Mrs. Seiple was very pleasing and the applause from the big audience showed that it was appreciated. Mrs. Seiple sang the "Ave Maria," by Mascagni, very beautifully.

Miss Susan Mitchell from Midway, Kentucky, U.S.A., who is spending a few weeks in Japan also sang. Her solos showed marked talent and the fact that she was called upon to sing a third encore shows that she was most highly appreciated. Her high notes were reached with ease and her voice is naturally musical.

The Sendai United Orchestra, 35 members strong, under the direction of J. M. Stick did well, but their harmony was sadly at fault and some parts of their selections were not up to the standard.

Mr. Paul Witte, a business man from Yokohama, sang a beautiful German solo and afterward favored the audience with several whistling solos which "took the house by storm."

The Japanese music on koto, samisen, shakuhachi, and the Salsuma biwa, was well rendered and well received. There was some criticism made regarding the Salsuma Biwa player who is Mr. Onishi from the Ueno Academy of Music, Tokyo. His playing was not up to the standard of the Sendai Japanese, and he should be more careful in selecting such important engagements.

The most enjoyable numbers on the programme were the violin solos by Prof. August Junker. The Cornet and Mellophone Solos by Rev. J. M. Stick were not up to his usual standard, but this is easily explained when we say that the entire concert was practically under the management of Mr. Stick but he has won the hearty gratitude of the Sendai community for the many musical feasts he has given. Other numbers on the programme were a Piano Duet by Mr. and Mrs. Paul Lambert Gerhard, a song by 57 young ladies from the Miyagi Jo Gakko, a male quartet by students from North Japan College; a Japanese popular song by two young men and winding up the Concert by bringing nearly all the students of the college on the stage and singing the North Japan college song recently written by one of the students. The whole audience, combined hands, orchestra and all present then sang the Kimi Ga Yo, bringing the evening to a most fitting close.

The concert was given in aid of the Miyagi Ken poor people and although there was great expense in getting it up there is reason to believe that a large sum will be handed over to the Ken officials for the poor of this community.

Dedication exercises of the Middle School Recitation Building in the North Japan College at Sendai took place on November 22nd-25th inclusive. The building, which was constructed by Mr. G. de Lalande, architect, Yokohama, has cost ¥52,000 and is emphatically an architectural ornament to the locality. The actual dedication ceremony took place on the following day (23rd); an alumni meeting was held on the 24th, a patrons' meeting following in the afternoon, and an oratorical contest in the evening; and finally on Saturday a reception for members of Sendai churches was held in the afternoon, and a Christian Educational Meeting in the evening. At nearly all these meetings many addresses were made and the musical numbers were greatly enjoyed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TWO POINTS OF VIEW.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR.—The possibility of widely divergent views of the same affair is well illustrated by the following clippings, of which the first is from Electric Messages of Tokyo, and the second from the Japan Chronicle of Kobe:—

A TIME OF TROUBLE.

The mob went into the Mission (No. 2) and took every movable thing, including the matting on the floor, the doors, windows, benches, organ, Bibles, tracts and personal property of Bro. Koji, his wife and mother; and carrying them into the street they piled them in a heap on the street car tracks and burned them up. This particular mob seemed to have their attention turned from the government to the churches now, and began a raid upon all the churches in that part of the city. About half an hour's walk from Mission No. 2, in one direction, they burned a church and residence belonging to Bro. Bergstrom of the Scandinavian Alliance, and in another direction a new Methodist church, also some Catholic property; and vowing they would wreck our Central Gospel Mission, they began making their way to Kanda, doing what damage they pleased along the way. Things looked bad for Mission No. 1, but there was prayer going up to God. As this building belongs to us the loss would be much greater if they got at it. Before they reached there, however, martial law was proclaimed and we were given a strong guard of soldiers both at the Mission and at the Bible School and homes; and although the mob made three assaults upon the guard surrounding the Mission they were driven back each time, and the building saved. This mob threatened to come out to our Bible School and homes, and as there seemed real danger, word was sent to us to hide or make our escape. This was on the night of the 6th, and about nine o'clock, we took a few necessary things, and with a few of the students began to walk into the country in the direction of Yokohama. As we could get no conveyances, we had to walk several miles, and finally picked up several jinrikishas, in which we made our way to a small station on the Yokohama line, where things were quiet. It was almost daylight when we reached there, having been nearly all night on the way. It was a night never to be forgotten, a beautiful clear summer's night; and as we walked along through the narrow roads, the angels who had charge, seemed very near indeed. There were no mishaps along the way, although many people eyed us suspiciously and some wanted to follow us. Taking the first train in the morning, we arrived at Yokohama, and finding no disturbance there we left the women and children at the home of a friend and returned to Tokyo. Arriving there we found that as martial law had been proclaimed, and that we had a good strong guard of soldiers; and that the mobs were being dispersed, and that quiet would soon be restored, we thought it best to have the missionary families return, which they did the next day. There was some attempt made, by the crowd, to reach the Bible School, but they were kept back, and we suffered no further harm than the destruction of the property of Mission No. 2, which amounts to less than $500.00. We resumed the meetings at the Central Mission on the evening of the 10th, and although some of the mob were there, there was no disturbance, and two souls were saved—praise God!

AN INTERESTING INCIDENT.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

Near where we reside, there live a group of American missionaries. They call themselves "Believers in faith-cure." In days of peace and tranquillity they used to accuse us of lack of faith, because we go to doctors when we get sick, and do not rely exclusively on prayers, as they do. We were "unsanctified" in their eyes; and our "rationalistic, unbiblical faith" was a subject of much comment in their meetings.

But recently, when there was an outbreak of lawlessness in this city, and a fear came upon them of attack by mobs, these very missionaries were the first to flee for their lives, leaving their sheep behind them. The story goes that they fled on their feet, and avoided trains, because they feared that the mobs might catch them. And it was only after a strong remonstrance, sent to them by their native helpers that they came back to their station, which was now strongly guarded by Imperial soldiers with glittering bayonets set on their Murata rifles.

The whole incident is interesting as illustrating a psychological principle that underlies religious enthusiasm of a certain class of missionaries. And we who are quick to go to doctors when we get sick, and slow to apply to the Army Department when threatened by the attack of a mob, we may not be, after all, such an "unsanctified" set of believers as these reverend gentlemen imagine.

AMICUS.

Tokyo: Sept. 18th, 1905.

By-the-way, these were the only missionaries, so far as we have learned, who deserted their posts during the riots in Tokyo.

MISTAKES IN TELEGRAMS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I have read your remarks in your issue of the 22nd instant also the complaint of "Business Man" contained in your issue of 24th, in reference to the frequency of mutilated telegrams received from the telegraph office, and the consequent loss to parties concerned. The telegraph department would appear to be inefficient, and to my own knowledge it is so, as far as the knowledge of English possessed by the staff is concerned. The number of mutilations contained in telegrams delivered to the office in which I am engaged, is simply surprising.

Perhaps a memorial signed by the merchants and addressed to the proper authorities, may bring about the desired improvement.

I am, Sir, etc.,

BURNT MAIL BAGS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In connection with my letter dated the 15th June last, regarding the burnt mail per Athenian, despatched from this office on the 3rd June, 1905, I beg with much regret to say that we are now in receipt of further information from the United States Postal Administration to the effect that the burnt mail bags are 3 bags for New York and 1 bag for Boston (enclosing one bag from Osaka) consisting of ordinary letter mail from Yokohama and that the accident occurred in the train wrecked on the 21st June last in the United States of America.

Yours faithfully,

T. AONUMA.

THE CHARACTER OF THE JAPANESE PEOPLE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES.")

SIR,—It may be timely to say something about Western misapprehensions of Japanese character, for they may lead to disappointment on both sides and to a certain degree of estrangement unless they are corrected.

Let me not be misunderstood. I love, honour, and believe in the Japanese, among whom I have been living for the past nine years, and expect that their future in many lines will be greater than their past or their present, and that this will be to the great good of the world, and that the Power is fortunate which by timely and generous recognition has obtained not only their alliance, but their grateful friendship.

Yet it is true that the sudden revulsion of feeling has come when those who, not a generation ago, were thought of as pretty, interesting, artistic, little dolls or children, fantastic and whimsical, unsettled in purpose and loose in morals, dishonest in business, and cruel if you scratched through the skin, "great in little things and little in great things," have come out on the broad stage of the world, as great in design as they are careful about the minutest detail, as steady in their wide political aims as they are ready to change anything however well-established in order to further those aims, as capable of silent, uniled, disciplined action as they are versatile in face of a problem, or self-abandoning in a charge with the bayonet, as self-controlled in victory and tender to a fallen or captured enemy as they are unsparring while the conflict still continues.

In all history perhaps there is nothing more dramatically splendid in the way of returning good for evil than the story of the Russian cruiser Rurik and the Japanese Hilachi Maru and Sado Maru. At the risk of telling what is well known I must repeat it in outline. It will be remembered that last year the Rurik, with its comrades from Vladivostok, came out just in time to catch these two Japanese troopships crossing to Korea.

Was it bad shooting only, or was it unwillingness to be embarrassed with prisoners, that led to the defenceless troopships being pounded by a ship of war almost exclusively above the water-line for three hours before the Hilachi Maru was sunk with all hands, so far as Russian aid was concerned, and the Sado Maru, with all hands, was left in what appeared to be a sinking condition? There can be no doubt that the Japanese, with ample excuse, believed this Russian savagery to be wilful. Yet a few months later, when the Rurik met her fate in those same waters, Admiral Kamimura, though still engaged with the enemy, detailed ships which saved 900 of the Rurik's crew; and in the recent battle in the Sea of Japan the service of the Sado Maru in saving Russian lives was conspicuous within a few miles of the spot where she had been left to sink with all on board.

It is only natural that in the face of such deeds as these, and the noble letters from Japanese soldiers and seamen, and the modest reports of commanders, who do great things themselves and take for granted noble ideals nobly pursued in all who serve under them, Englishmen should suppose all the other virtues and ideals in the Japanese which would certainly be found in an Englishman, who should do as they are doing. They are so admirable—so unexpectedly admirable—in many things, are they not admirable in all?

Baron Suyematsu neatly touched off the Western misjudgment, both pro and con, of the Japanese when he said something to this effect:—Now that we have shown that we can kill 100,000 men the West acknowledges us to be really civilized. So perfectly have the leaders of Japan kept their heads while the world has gone wild in their praise!

The fact is that in England men so patriotic would certainly be noble; men so self-restrained would almost certainly be moral; men so self-forgetting would surely be honest in trade; men so brave would scorn to tell a lie; men with such high ideals would be strongly individual, they would mould their surroundings to themselves rather than conform to them, whatever they may be: they could be reckoned upon to remain much the same under all circumstances. We find conspicuously displayed in the Japanese those virtues which come to the front naturally where the theory of life involves individual effortment—those virtues so hard for us individualistic Western people to practise; and we take it for granted that the virtues associated with individual energy and self-dependence which are so easy to us as to become a stille qua non in one whom we esteem will be present also. But it is not so. The Japanese are as deficient in this group of qualities as we are in the others, and no one knows and regrets this more than the real leaders of Japan, who know both the East and the West. Happily, also, no people that I have met with are so glad to be told of their defects as the Japanese, or when they are told so ready to consider with good temper what is said with a view to amendment if they find the criticism to be just and, at the same time, not patronizing, but sympathetic. I have not the slightest fear but that this paper if it should find its way back to the Japanese Press, will bring to the writer gratitude rather than dislike by its plain speaking.

But the fact remains that in the face of the present enthusiastic and well-earned admiration for the Japan there is a reason for plain speaking lest there should come a disillusion causing each side to distrust the other through unreasonable disappointment.

It is a fact while the Government of Japan, the leading bankers, and a very few commercial houses, which really have appreciated the higher commercial ideals of the West, are completely trustworthy in matters of business and up in the country out of reach of the "haste to grow rich" a simple honesty is to be found, such as has enabled me to build the house in which I am writing without a clerk of the works or my own presence, and on an estimate not a contract, yet in general a Japanese would value the promise of an Englishman more than the bond of a Japanese. It is true that the Japanese in Rome does as Rome does. He fits into his surroundings, is always gracious and desirous to please, has few angles. Among jockeys he will live and talk as a jockey, among gentlemen as a gentleman. In a clerical family in England he will go to church and behave in all ways as a religious man. In the ballroom he will be agreeable but not forward; and he catches quickly the tone of the society in which he is. If the Oxford undergraduate from Japan has gone to France or Germany by way of utilizing his vacation you will know which it was on his return by his manners as well as by his tones. This is not hypocrisy, except as all adaptability, conscious and unconscious, is hypocrisy. It is a great gift and also a great snare both to himself and to those who interpret him as they would interpret an Englishman.

One illustration of this is of prime importance. I would deprecate with all the force possible the marriage of an English girl to a Japanese. In this letter I have avoided all reference to Christianity, nor have I in mind the difference of race, though this also may reasonably be taken into account apart from any invidious questions of "higher" or "lower" races. But simply an English girl who meets a Japanese living in England like an Englishman can have no possible means of forming a judgement of what he will prove to be when he lives as a Japanese in Japan. Of course a Christian girl ought not to be "unequally yoked" with an unbeliever; but even if he is a Christian, baptized in England, his Christianity needs to be tested in his own country. His very conformity in England may prove to be evidence, so far as it goes, that he will conform to custom also in Japan; and if it proves so, then his wife in Japan will be subject to his mother who will direct everything, even the bringing up of the children; and if the wife cannot get on with the mother the "artificial" relation will, as a matter of course, go to the wall, in favour of the "natural." He does not owe anything to the wife like what he owes to the mother, and he cannot change his mother if the two cannot live together. I doubt not that there have been such things as happy marriages of this kind, but the probability that the return to Japan will bring disillusion is enormous.

Nor is the relation to the mother the only question. The disparity of ideas between England and Japan about what marriage means is immense. The Rev. A. Lloyd, translator and editor of the (Japanese) "Imperial Songs," has recently printed in the proceedings of the "Asiatic Society of Japan" the translation of "A Japanese problem play" of the present day, with explanatory introduction. (I send a copy herewith.) Nothing could illustrate better the transitional state of society in Japan, the many elements that are meeting as new and old ideas become fused together. A Western reader in reading it says at one moment, "What noble spirits!" and at the next, "How can society hold together thus, eaten through and through with moral laxity." And it is the very same characters in the play which give rise to both these thoughts. These characters are typical in Japan, bizarre, if not impossible, in England. The war has brought into the sight of all the world exactly the strong side of these characters. What Englishman would imagine that the other coexists with it in the same persons?

As I have already said, I look for greater things for Japan in the future than in the present. The nation is so docile and its leaders are so much and so steadily in earnest. They watch for those points which may be learnt from abroad to make good deficiencies in the national character. If, on the commercial side, Baron Shibusawa says that he could wish the old Samurai spirit would so grow up in them that a merchant would commit kara-biri from sheer shame when he found himself unable to be as good as his word; in the other great branch of morals of which I have been speaking the Government is doing all it can to tighten the bonds and to raise the ideals of married life. Unless report is greatly misled the domestic life of the Crown Prince would do honour to any Christian house, though he has never been within reach of directly Christian influences; but immemorial custom is dead against such self-restraint, especially in the Imperial family.

The fact is that, if the Japanese assimilate Western virtues without losing their own, they may be the means of raising both individual and national character, and international relations also, to a higher level than they have yet reached, to something less inconsistent with the fundamental principles of Christianity; but they are not at that level now; and if at this stage English enthusiasm credits them with virtues to which they have not attained, the day of disillusion may have consequences unfavorable to the efficiency and continuity of that alliance which promises to become the best guarantee for the peace and progress of the world.

WILLIAM AWDRY, Bishop.

SIR,—In last Monday's issue of The Times there was a long letter from the Right Rev. William Awdry, Bishop of South Tokyo, Japan, in which he says that "in general a Japanese would value the promise of an Englishman more than the bond of a Japanese"; and that the Japanese are deficient in a certain group of qualities, including honesty in trade. It seems to me that it would be unfair for The Times to allow such a charge against Japanese integrity, endorsed by a Bishop, to go unchallenged, when The Times has, in its own office, records that prove a promise made by a Japanese to be at least as trustworthy as a promise made by an Englishman. During the past eight years The Times has sold, in almost every country in the world, sets of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" on the instalment plan, giving credit for periods of two, three, and four years. The regularity with which such payments are made is certainly a fair test of the average honesty of any nation, and a much more severe test in the case of Japan than in the case of England, because it is more difficult there than here to enforce payment by legal proceedings. Ninety-five per cent. of the "Encyclopædias" sold in Japan were sold to Japanese, not to foreign residents, and the statements I am about to make refer exclusively to purchases made by the Japanese themselves. In Japan, as elsewhere, each purchaser, when he signs his "order-form," promises to pay, on certain dates, certain sums of money. In Japan the monthly payment was 10 yen, equal to about a sovereign, while in this country the amount was a guinea. In Great Britain less than half the payments arrived on the day promised. In Japan less than 1 per cent. of the payments were even one day late, and more than one-half of the payments were made the day before they were due, because the Japanese did not like to run the risk of any accidental delay that might make them even one day late. The cost of collecting these instalment payments in Japan is less than half as much as in England, simply because the Japanese are so punctilious that clerical labour and postage are not expended in reminding them that their payments are overdue. They seem to look upon every debt as a debt of honour, which must not be forgotten for even a day. There is certainly no such delicacy of feeling in this country about commercial transactions.

I find it difficult to believe that the Bishop of South Tokyo is right when he says that the Japanese do not trust one another; and I know that he is wrong if he in himself believes, as he implies, that the Japanese are not "honest in trade." But I quite admit that Englishmen who have long resided in Japan did not believe that it would be prudent for The Times to adopt in Japan the instalment system of selling books, previously unknown there. When the representative of The Times arrived in Japan to sell the "Encyclopædia," he naturally asked English residents there what they thought of the project. With one exception the answer was:—"You cannot sell the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' here because almost every English and American resident has already obtained a copy from England, and, of course, the Japanese will not buy—fortunately for you, because if they did they would not pay." The only English resident who did not say this said:—"Of course you can sell any number of 'Encyclopædias' to the Japanese, but you will never be able to collect the payments when they have once got the books. No Japanese will pay for the 'Encyclopædia' when he finds he can get it without payment." In the face of this advice, the instalment plan of sale was adopted, with the results above described. I may add that the Japanese bought five times as many "Encyclopædias" as were sold in France and Germany combined, 50 times as many as in Russia, more than in any other country except India, Australia, and the United States.

When I see a Bishop of the Church of England, who has lived in Japan since 1898, write with so little appreciation of the Japanese, I wonder whether some of our countrymen are not as blind as the Russian statesmen who, in the early days of the war, described the Japanese as "yellow monkeys," and as blind as the Ambassador of the Tsar who made the statement in Tokyo before the war, that the mobilization of one army corps in Russia would frighten the Japanese into immediate submission. No one in The Times Office, at any rate, can doubt that the standard of integrity among the Japanese is so high that when young men, who have bought the "Encyclopædia," abandoned their employment to go to the front, their families promptly paid the instalments due, under circumstances of the utmost difficulty.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THE MANAGER OF YOUR PUBLICATION

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

MILITARY REFORM.

London, November 24.

The Standard states that the authorities are considering the question of reorganizing the commands in the colonies with a view to their co-ordination.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.

London, November 24.

The Lieutenant-Governor of the Transvaal has been appointed Governor of Madras.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

A meeting of the Cabinet was held yesterday. It is rumoured that the next step will be dissolution. The situation is the absorbing topic among Liberal newspapers, which declare that Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman will refuse to form a Cabinet under present circumstances. He insists upon dissolution.

JAPANESE LOAN.

Twenty-five of a fifty million sterling Japanese loan was floated on the 23rd at ninety; Paris takes 12, London $\frac{1}{2}$, New York $\frac{3}{4}$ and Berlin $\frac{3}{4}$.

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN "STANDS PAT" ON HOME RULE.

London, November 25.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, speaking at Stirling, openly declared himself in favour of home rule for Ireland, his convictions with reference to which are stronger than ever. He advised the Nationalists to accept any instalment of representative control that might be offered, always provided it led up to a larger policy.

BALFOUR'S ECLIPSE.

The newspapers continue to take Mr. Balfour's resignation for granted. The Morning Post says that Mr. Chamberlain and not Mr. Balfour will lead the Unionists at the elections.

THE ENGLISH CABINET.

Later.

The Cabinet Council lasted for two hours. It is understood that it was decided not to resign. It is stated that the British Government's decision was largely influenced by the knowledge that the Liberals would not accept office prior to dissolution; therefore while the present Government will not meet Parliament again, it defers either resigning or dissolving for a few weeks, thus avoiding both the general elections at Christmastide and the necessity of a short-lived interim Government.

The Cabinet meets again on the 1st of December.

London, November 26.

The general consensus of opinion in England is that dissolution will take place early in January. It is uncertain whether the Balfour Government will resign before that time.

RIOTS AND BLOODSHED IN RUSSIA.

Reports from the Russian provinces continue to speak of serious risings on the part of the peasantry in many of the country districts.

The sailors at Sevastopol and a regiment of troops have mutinied.

Rear-Admiral Pesarepaski was shot while haranguing the men.

The dockers have joined the mutineers and several riots have taken place.

TURKEY AND THE POWERS.

The International Fleet at the Piræus have sailed with sealed orders.

PEACE RATIFICATIONS.

The peace treaty ratifications have been exchanged at Washington.

REVOLT OF LORD ROSEBERY.

London, November 27.

Lord Rosebery has delivered a speech declaring emphatically, explicitly and once for all that he cannot serve under Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's Home Rule flag.

The speech has caused the utmost surprise in Liberal circles, inasmuch as Lord Rosebery's former speeches had led to the supposition that he fully intended to co-operate with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

THE SEVASTOPOL MUTINY.

The most serious feature of the Sevastopol mutiny is the wholesale defection of the troops, who are apparently making common cause with the mutineers. Only one regiment remains loyal.

No excesses have been committed hitherto.

The silence of the official communications concerning measures of suppression is regarded as confirming the rumour that the warships are in the hands of the mutineers and that the revolt has been carefully prepared and determinedly carried out.

THE SEVASTOPOL MUTINY.

London, November 28.

The latest accounts from Sevastopol vary in details, but all indicate that the mutiny is subsiding.

Later.

The situation at Sevastopol is not clear, but the mutiny appears to be revolutionary in character. The artillerymen in the fortress have refused to fire on the mutineers.

THE POWERS AND THE PORTE.

The International fleet has arrived at Mitylene.

JAPAN'S NEW LOAN.

The prospectus of Japan's new loan was issued in London yesterday afternoon. The rush of applicants was greater than ever.

THE PORTE AND THE POWERS.

London, November 29.

The International Fleet has landed detachments of men at Mitylene and seized the Customs-house there.

THE MUTINY AT SEVASTOPOL.

The mutiny at Sevastopol began by the crews of the Russian war-vessels Panteleimon and Otkhakov hoisting the red flag on the 24th inst. The crews then landed and held a meeting at which a deputation from the Brest (?) regiment swore that the whole regiment would defend the sailors to the utmost. Thereupon the soldiers and sailors paraded the streets, bearing red flags. The Panteleimon is now in the hands of the authorities, but the crew and mutinied soldiers have shut themselves in the barracks. Admiral Chukhmin is anxious to attack them but is afraid that the artillerymen may join the mutineers. Part of the Odessa garrison is ready to join the mutineers.

THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

Later.

A significant passage in the Kaiser's speech at the opening of the German Reichstag says that the relations of Germany with all the Powers are correct, and with most them are good and friendly. After this the Message states that the Kaiser welcomes Japan among the great Powers with sincere wishes for the success of the peaceful civilizing mission of this highly-gifted people. He sympathized keenly with the Tsar's endeavours to reorganize Russia's internal affairs. He was gratified with the agreement on the Morocco question, which originated solely through the tendency to ignore German interests. He regarded peace as a sacred thing, but the signs of the times demanded the strengthening of the national defences against unrighteous attacks.

JAPANESE LOAN.

The Japanese loan list opened at 10 a.m. and closed at 1 o'clock.

NEW FRENCH AMBASSADOR.

London, November 30.

M. Raindre, now Minister at Bern, has been appointed French Ambassador to Tokyo.

SOCIALIST DEMONSTRATION IN VIENNA.

Business was at a standstill yesterday in Vienna, the Socialists having organised a huge but orderly universal suffrage demonstration on the occasion of the opening of the Reichsrath, 200,000 persons participating in the proceedings. A deputation from the gathering was favourably received by the Government.

REVOLT OF THE RUSSIAN ARMY.

The attitude of the Army is the most serious feature in the Russian situation. It is admitted at St. Petersburg that a spirit of revolt pervades the whole army, from Vladivostok to St. Petersburg. The Manchurian forces are in a condition of almost open rebellion and the garrison at St. Petersburg has formulated demands involving a complete remodelling of the conditions of service.

A panic has occurred on the St. Petersburg Bourse, resulting in a heavy fall of prices.

Communication is interrupted with Moscow, where the telegraphists have struck work.

RESULTS OF THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

Following the Kaiser's speech, the Berlin Press, with remarkable accord, insists on the necessity of an increase in the German Navy.

THE JAPANESE LOAN.

Later.

The Japanese loan has been largely over-subscribed in London, Paris and Berlin.

MEDICAL COURTESIES BETWEEN BRITAIN AND JAPAN.

Anglo-Japanese negotiations are proceeding with reference to the mutual admission of medical men to practice in their respective territories, especially Japanese.

FINANCIAL PANIC IN RUSSIA.

In St. Petersburg the frantic selling of securities is continuous to-day.

On the Bourse to-day prices reached the lowest point yet recorded.

THE KAISER'S SPEECH.

The German papers do not hesitate to consider that the Kaiser's words about foreign relations were aimed at Great Britain and France.

The English newspapers accept the speech calmly, believing that it was delivered with the view of increasing the German Navy.

The British Admiralty has decided to add the five battleships from the China squadron permanently to the Channel fleet, which will henceforth be divided into two squadrons whereof these five battleships will form practically the North Sea squadron with a temporary base at Dover.

(Received by the Foreign Office from Mr. Takahira.)

Washington, November 22.

The American Commercial Agent in Vladivostok telegraphs to the State Department that Japanese subjects like all foreigners, are free to land. About 30 Japanese have not landed but that is not because they are forbidden to do so; it is because of the disturbance which prevents landing. There are many rumours pointing to a renewal of the disturbance, and trade will be suspended for some days, but the commotion seems to be subsiding, and there will probably be nothing serious hereafter.

(RECEIVED BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE)

VLADIVOSTOK.

The Norwegian steamer Tungus has reached Nagasaki from Vladivostok, which place she left on the 23rd instant. She reports that the disturbance has been quelled by the arrival of some 12,000 Cossacks. About one-third of the buildings in the town have been burned. Official edifices and commercial houses were all involved in the calamity. Trade is at present suspended but the large stores have probably been opened to-day.

PEST.

The Government of Singapore has declared Osaka and Kobe to be infected ports.

KING HAKON OF NORWAY.

King Hakon VII. of Norway entered Christiania on the 27th November and the same day took the oath in Parliament to maintain the constitution of Norway.

(RECEIVED AT THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE "SOYA."

The Soya (Varyag) which was to have reached Yokosuka on the 26th inst. met with severe weather en route and anchored at Wakanoura, Kishu, whence she was to leave as soon as the storm abates.

RUSSIAN CRUISERS.

The three Russian cruisers—the Rossia, Gromovoi and Bogatyn—entered Nagasaki harbour on Wednesday.

DEDICATION EXERCISES AT SENDAI.

The dedication exercises of the recently completed Recitation Hall for the Tohoku Gakuin (North Japan College) were held on November 22nd-25th.

Tohoku Gakuin was begun in June, 1886, by Revs. M. Oshikawa and W. E. Hey with 7 students. To day the school has a faculty of 27, and 290 students are enrolled. The school is divided into a general course, (Chu Gakko grade) and a special course, the latter including a 3 years, literary course, open to graduates of the general course, an English theological Course, open to graduates of the second year of the literary course. Until the present all the departments have been accommodated in very crowded quarters in a Recitation Hall erected in 1892 for the Theological Department and in temporary frame buildings. The building just dedicated is entirely for the general course, while the Special course will be very comfortable in the old building. The new Recitation Hall is a fine, large brick building, two stories in height and 228 feet long, and stands in a campus of about 3 acres. In addition to president's room, teachers' room, offices, reception room, 2 museums, an indoor gymnasium and a chapel seating 800, the building contains 13 class rooms, and 432 students can be accommodated. All the rooms are fitted out with comfortable seats, fine slate blackboards, are well lighted and are heated by hot air furnaces in the cellar.

The dedication exercises began on Wednesday evening, the 22nd, with a commemorative charity concert, held by the school in the Sendai theatre. A large audience was present, an excellent programme was well rendered, and over 300 yen was realized to be given to the needy in Miyagi Ken.

One of the most interesting exercises of the week was held Thursday morning in the chapel when the members of the 5th year class presented a fine life size portrait of President D. B. Schueder to the school.

The formal dedication service was held on Thursday afternoon. The large chapel was filled with students, teachers, and other friends of the institution. Prof. S. Tanaka, dean of the general course, presided. After scripture reading, prayer, and the reading of the Imperial Rescript, Rev. J. P. Moore, D.D., of Tokyo, a member of the Board and formerly a teacher in the school, delivered an address on "The True Mission of North Japan College." He said in part:—In one sense the mission of this school is the same as that of any other school of like grade; in another, it has a distinctive mission. With other schools it teaches the sciences, etc., but unlike many others it teaches these branches from the Christian standpoint. Its founders wish the school to be a first class, up-to-date school, but their intentions cannot be realized by making it simply the very best educational agency in the country. They have a higher object in view, and that is the moral and spiritual training of the young men who come here. And in order to give this training they believe it necessary to teach that there is a God and Father who has created and governs the world; that history is the unfolding of His plan; and that man is first of all a spiritual being, and as such requires spiritual training. Is there room and need for a such a school in this country? So long as truth and righteousness and exalted character are necessary for the highest order of individual and national life, a school like this finds a place in any land. In order that the school may fulfil its heaven-ordained mission, it needs, in addition to a good building and faithful teachers and earnest students, the patronage of the people of this community and this country. The fact that it is a Christian school should be no objection. Men like Gladstone, President Roosevelt, Secretary Taft, and in Japan famous men like Baron Kaneko, Suematsu, and Komura received the training for their life work in Christian universities like Oxford in England, and Harvard, Yale, and Princeton in America. I express the hope that this our beloved school may continue to be a bright and shining star not only in Northeastern Japan, but for the entire country.

The Hon. S. Ebara, M.P. of Tokyo, delivered an address in which he said in part:—It is a matter of congratulation for not only the city of Sendai but for the whole empire that so soon after the conclusion of the war such a beautiful building is being dedicated. I desire to express our thanks to the foreign friends who have done so much to lead Young Japan. Many of the leaders among the people and in the government received much of their education under foreign teachers, Drs. Verbeck, Hepburn, and others. Especially in Christian educational systems of the west has been felt. In recent years, however, Christian education in Japan has been in a somewhat hopeless condition. Nevertheless Tohoku Gakuin has in spite of all unfavorable circumstances successfully pushed forward year by year. When we consider the prominent features of Christian education we find that institutions such as Tohoku Gakuin emphasize the culture of personal character. Western civilization is like a human hand, with fingers of different lengths. Learning is most advanced in Germany; fine arts in France, and commerce and industry in England and the United States. In Japan the spirit of loyalty and patriotism excels. From now on what is most important for Japan is the improvement of industry and commerce. In commerce what is most needed is confidence. To this end the character of the people should be improved. This the Christian schools endeavor to do. Christianity teaches that all men and women are equally under obligation to do good, to act rightly.

Original from

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

President Schueder then gave a short history of the school and of the building operations. He stated that the cost of the building was about 52,000 yen. Most of this money was given by the members of the Reformed Church in the United States, the balance having come from students and teachers of the school, the friends in both Japan and America having worked very earnestly. The object in building this new recitation hall was to give Japanese students a Christian education. Our aim is to saturate the course with Christian ideas and thoughts. The Tohoku Gakuin will fulfil its mission if it can send out young men of character into the society of Japan and to the different other countries of the Orient.

He then, in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, dedicated the building to Christian education, and after the dedication, offered the dedicatory prayer.

Congratulatory addresses were read by Hon. C. Haritsuka, representing the Minister of Education, by Count K. Date, by Governor Tanabe, by Mayor Hayakawa, by the representative of Lieut.-General C. Yamanouchi, Head of the Second Army Division, by the presidents of several of the other schools in the city, and by other friends.

The presence of most of the leading educators of the community and the many congratulations and kind wishes expressed show what a warm place the school has in the hearts of the people of Sendai, and speak well for the future success of the school.

In the evening over 300 students, professors and alumni took part in a lantern parade, marching through the principal streets, singing the college song and shouting "Banzai."

On Friday morning an alumni meeting was held. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Schneider and by a number of the alumni. In the course of his address Dr. Schneider said: We now possess a splendid building, one of the best among the Chu Gakko in Japan. A splendid building demands splendid character. The one purpose of students, teachers and alumni should be the spread of the kingdom of God. Since Commodore Perry came to Japan, Japan has made gigantic progress in material civilization. The mission of our school is to aid in introducing the spiritual life of the Kingdom of God.

On Friday afternoon a Patrons' Meeting was held, there being a large attendance of parents and others. A number of addresses on the purpose and aim of the school were delivered.

On Friday evening the Literary Society held an Oratorical Contest. Six excellent orations were delivered, first prize being won by Mr. S. Tomita, of the 5th year, and second prize by Mr. R. Hirayama, of the 4th year.

Saturday morning and afternoon the school held a very successful undokwai. There were the usual games, races, and contests. A feature of the day was a newspaper issued 10 or 12 times during the day, and distributed among the spectators. The paper was printed on mimeograph and appeared in both English and Japanese editions.

On Saturday afternoon a reception was given the members of the Christian churches in Sendai and a large number of persons were present. The exercises of the week were concluded on Saturday evening with a Christian Educational meeting, addressed by Prof. K. Sasao, Ph.D., one of the professors of Tohoku Gakuin, by Hon. S. Tashiro, Chairman of the Ken Assembly and President of the Y.M.C.A., and by Rev. Y. Honda, President of Aoyama Gakuin. The meeting was largely attended, many of the leading educators of the city being present. The three excellent addresses were listened to with close attention throughout.

One very interesting feature of all the exercises was the excellent music rendered by the Sendai Military Band and the Sendai Orchestra, under the direction of Rev. J. M. Stick, and by the college Glee Club and Quartet, under the direction of Prof. J. F. Steiner, and by Mrs. Kobayashi, Mrs. Seiple, Mrs. Stick, Mrs. Gerhard, Miss Mochitate, Miss Gerhard, Mr. Steiner and Mr. Stick.

During the entire week there was perfect weather. The grounds and front of the building were beautifully decorated with evergreen arches and flags and bunting. The beautiful weather, the large attendance, the interesting meetings and the enthusiasm, interest and earnest purpose manifested by students, teachers and friends all unite in making the week one of the most memorable in the history of the school.

A FATAL accident took place on the evening of Dec. 1st at the Nininiya-ro, Yuraku-cho, Yokohama. An employee named S. KOREA.

Friday, December 1.

Marquis Ito left Seoul on the afternoon of the 29th ultimo. He was to have set out in the morning, but by request of the Emperor he invited the Korean Ministers to the house of General Hasegawa and delivered a parting address, the terms of which are not reported. His Excellency was received in farewell audience on the 28th, when the Emperor expressed his intention of sending an ambassador to Japan in acknowledgment of the Marquis' visit. It is stated that the final address delivered by His Excellency was attended by all the Korean Ministers except Pak Che-soon, Minister of Foreign Affairs, who was unwell.

Tokyo newspapers say that the Ambassador sent by Korea will be the Crown Prince.

Mr. Pak Che-soon, who signed the new Convention, has become Prime Minister, and is succeeded at the Foreign Office by Mr. Yun, hitherto Vice-Minister.

In consequence of the change in the colour of Korean garments, inaugurated by a recent edict, a demand for dyers has been created, and numerous Japanese are said to be availing themselves of the situation to commence work in Seoul and elsewhere.

A telegram to the Hochi Shimbun from Seoul states that Mr. Min Yonghwa, who at one time served as Prime Minister in Korea, has of late been much distressed about the affairs of his country. Two or three days ago he fell into a state of profound melancholy, and at 7 a.m. on the 30th ultimo he committed suicide. If the Hochi's information be correct this is a very pitiable incident, but it remains to be learned what was the real cause of the suicide.

Saturday, December 2.

Min Yonghwan, whose suicide has just been reported, was at one time a strong advocate of Russian influence in Korea. After the incidents which ended in the Emperor (then King) taking refuge in the Russian Legation, Min was appointed Korean Representative in St. Petersburg and was present at the coronation ceremony of the Tsar. On his return to Korea he seems to have abandoned his pro-Russian tendencies and to have espoused the doctrine that safety for Korea lay in throwing herself into the arms of America. Last April he held the portfolio of Prime Minister for a brief period and was subsequently appointed Chief Chamberlain, which office he held at the time of his death. On the 28th he formed one of the party of men who, under the leadership of Cho Pyong-sik, proceeded to the Palace and made a somewhat violent remonstrance against the new Convention with Japan. The Emperor's attempts to quiet these malcontents proved fruitless and His Majesty finally ordered them to present themselves at the Court of Justice in order to receive punishment. They repaired thither on the morning of the 29th and remained sitting, after the Korean custom, at the gate of the Court until the evening, when the Emperor sent a message of pardon. By that time Min seems to have become desperately excited. He entered the house of a dependant of his family—he is said to have been of the stock of the late Queen—and on the morning of the 30th, having ordered his attendants to quit his presence, he seized a large knife and cut his throat. When the corpse was carried to his residence, his mother is said to have been so affected that she took poison and died, but this was subsequently contradicted. It is stated that Cho Pyong-sik also attempted to kill himself but was restrained. He took opium and is now in the hands of Japanese doctors. The Asahi Shimbun's correspondent says that the Emperor and his high officials are making every effort to quiet men's minds and to check demonstrations hostile to the new order of things.

On the 30th ultimo at 2.30 p.m. a Japanese policeman, Takemura, while on duty near the Law Court in Seoul, was attacked by half a score of Koreans who assaulted him with sticks and stones, wounding him severely. Happily a sergeant-major of gendarmes came to the constable's relief and rescued him, not without some injury to the gendarme. Subsequently another body of Koreans attacked a Japanese police station. They were dispersed without difficulty though Captain Onchi was slightly wounded.

A later account says that from the morning of the 30th the anti-Japanese party had organized a meeting at the Bell Tower. One of the demonstrators was delivering an incendiary speech when the constable Takemura interfered. He was at once assaulted, and ultimately the Japanese had to move a force of gendarmes and military to the scene to restore order. Some 80 arrests were made and search for other rioters is being conducted.

The students of the Japanese Language School also are said to be showing signs of disturbance, and the institution is under police surveillance. Another anti-Japanese demonstration, consisting of about a thousand men, was organized by Chin San-heun, an official of the Decorations Bureau. It seems to have been quelled without much difficulty.

Sunday, December 3.

It appears that Cho Pyong-sik's suicide is an accomplished fact. We may mention that there is some confusion in the name telegraphed to Tokyo. The exact Korean pronunciation of the name would be "Cho Pyong-se," but the deceased being described as a man of 76 and one of the elder statesmen, the only inference is that Cho Pyong-sik is intended. Cho Pyong-sik visited Japan some years ago on a special mission which failed of accomplishment. The facts now related are that after he and his fellow-agitators had been released from attendance at the Board of Punishments, they proceeded to the Board of Decorations—about this place there is some uncertainty in the telegrams—and resumed their session of protest. On the morning of the 1st a message was carried thither from the Emperor. It was addressed to Cho, and it said that in consideration of his age he need not further concern himself about State affairs. Cho then entered his palanquin, but a few moments after his bearers had started to carry him home, groans were heard proceeding from the palanquin, and it was found that the old man had thrust a newspaper into his mouth and appeared to be suffering great agony. The newspaper being removed, his mouth was seen to be quite black, and there could be no doubt that he had swallowed a large quantity of opium. Medical assistance was of course rendered, but it proved unavailing and he expired at 4.10 p.m. Rumour further stated that Chin San-heun also had killed himself, but this appears to be unfounded. It seems to have been suggested by the fact that Chin and some 30 other fellow-agitators, who had assembled at the Board of Decorations for the purpose of preparing a petition to the Throne, refused to disperse when their comrades left the place, and were still in session at the time of latest advices.

The Emperor has conferred on Min Yong-hwan the posthumous name of "Chihung-mun" (Patriotic Scholar), which is the same title as that conferred on Li Hung-chang by the Emperor of China, except that the order of the ideographs is reversed. Min Yong-hwa is said to have left two statements written just before his death, one addressed to the people of Korea, the other to the Foreign Representatives at the Korean Court. These two unhappy men—Min Yong-hwa and Cho Pyong-sik—have showed that they value their country's independence above their own lives. There is the danger that by exalting their memories as they undoubtedly deserve to be exalted, others may be incited to follow their self-destructive example, but they will certainly have the admiration of every high-minded man so far as their motive was concerned. Such acts were not needed to ensure sympathy with Korea. All that can be said is that the lesser of two evils is chosen. No one will deny that Japan has shown much forbearance toward her little neighbour and that had there been many Koreans of the same stamp as Min Yong-hwa and Cho Pyong-sik, the country's sovereign prerogatives might safely have been left intact.

The number of arrests made in connexion with the riots is now said to have been 120, among the apprehended persons being 13 men of over 60. On investigation it was found that not one of the arrested men knew anything about the contents of the new convention. They had only one purpose, namely, to kill five of the Ministers of State and thus appeal to the nation. The Emperor has issued a tranquillizing decree, and Ministers are said to be calmly watching the developments of the situation. Strict order is preserved in Seoul by Japanese police and constables.

A rising of the Tonghak at Ok-chikon is reported, and it is added that a Japanese detachment has set out to quell them. This place is near Fusan.

The Chinese Minister has withdrawn from Seoul. It is curious that this event should occur just as Viceroy Yuan is at the zenith of his power. It was this same Yuan Shih-kai who, as Chinese Resident in Seoul eleven years ago, asserted his country's suzerainty so strenuously as to precipitate a conflict with Japan.

It is stated that the Korean Foreign Office will be abolished and that a bureau of foreign affairs will be created in the Cabinet.

From the 1st instant the railway from Pyong-yang to Wiju was opened to traffic. This means that the whole road from Seoul to Wiju is in running order, the Seoul-Pyongyang section having been previously opened.

Monday, December 4.

The Emperor of Korea is said to have been much incensed at the conduct of Cho Pyong-sik. His Majesty was making every possible effort to calm the agitation caused by the signing of the new Convention, whose contents had been greatly distorted by rumour, when Cho placed himself at the head of the agitators, and in contravention of his Sovereign's direct orders, persisted in fomenting the excitement. The Emperor sent a police officer to disperse the gathering in the Decorations Bureau, and it was when returning home in obedience to this order of dispersal that Cho committed suicide. He was the oldest among Korea's statesmen and the Emperor is said to have been much affected by the news of his death.

The Nippon sympathises with the Koreans. It imagines what the Japanese would do in similar circumstances. But Korea has never shown any really deep solicitude for her independence. Her policy has always been parasitic: if she could not shelter herself under the wing of China she fled to that of Japan, and from Japan she is equally ready to take refuge under that of Russia. Cho Pyong-sik and Han Kyu-hwa will be called "patriots" and not undeservedly. But thinking men must say that they sacrificed themselves in vain. For their deaths serve no good purpose. It is the duty of every true lover of his country to lay down his life cheerfully when the occasion calls for such a sacrifice, but in the case of Cho and Han no such occasion existed. Their Sovereign and their country remained intact, and a route to the recovery of complete autonomy lay plainly open. What the occasion demanded, and still demands, was the earnest exertions of every capable subject to raise the empire to such a point of progress as will enable Japan to leave it a free hand.

The Chuo Shinbun writes in a somewhat similar strain. It reminds the Koreans that Japan has no desire whatever to overthrow their empire: on the contrary, she desires to see them strong and independent, and she will assist them towards that goal if they are sufficiently sensible to assist themselves. Statesmen who take their own lives under such circumstances are conspicuous illustrations of the want of political perspicacity that paralyses the nation. They should see that their really patriotic role is to live and work. Did their example fire the masses to blind resistance, it would fare with Korea as it fared with Madagascar when the Hovas rebelled against a French protectorate.

The Yorozu Choho writes in a powerful and practical strain. It does not deny sympathy and tears to those statesmen who slew themselves on what they believed to be the tomb of their country's sovereignty, but it declares that such acts show how blind their perpetrators were to the true facts of the situation. For it is to the administrative mismanagement of officials like Cho, Han and their ancestors that Korea owes all the misfortunes which have befallen her. They it is who have led their people into the paths of corruption and indolence, instead of educating among them the spirit of industry and honesty without which no country can stand erect. At the first appearance of national trouble they quit the stage which their own mistakes have thrown into disorder, instead of remaining to face and correct the situation. They are to be profoundly pitied.

The Niroku Shimpo writes in much the same strain as the Yorozu. It recalls the historical fact that the ruin of the six States of China was due not to the prowess of China, their conqueror, but to their own impotence. What is the origin of Korea's troubles? Is it not to be found in the fact that her leading statesmen have hitherto lived not for their country but for themselves? From generation to generation the drama acted upon the administrative stage of Korea has had for leading feature family feuds. Min struggling against Li, and Li against Min, both alike wholly absorbed in pursuing their own selfish ambitions and careless of the welfare of the State. And now when the State is threatened with the consequences of their own unpatriotic mismanagement, they seek to recover their reputation for patriotism by killing themselves, whereas their really patriotic course would have been to live for the sake of correcting the abuses they are responsible for.

It is strongly urged that no time should be lost in despatching a competent statesman to fill the post of Resident General. Baron Kodama was widely spoken of for the post, but it appears that he will be fully occupied with Manchurian affairs. Rumour now indicates Viscount Yoshikawa as likely to be nominated. The Viscount is a man of proved ability and remarkable tact.

Marquis Ito delivered a short speech at Shimonoseki in the presence of a deputation sent to receive him. After alluding to local topics and his own intimate connexion with Shimonoseki, his Excellency went on to say that on his mission to Korea he had merely sought to carry out the instructions and the will of his Sovereign. The actual duty of making the Treaty had been entrusted to the Japanese Representative. The Koreans were not to be classed for an instant with the negroes of Africa, the Indians of America, or the Malays of the south. They were a civilized people who had learned much of what China had to teach in the days of the Chou dynasty when the immortal Confucius was born, and they now possessed litterateurs of the first force. To such a people it must be profoundly painful to see the control of their country's inter-State relations and the duty of protecting it entrusted to a foreign Power, and to recognise that much of the substance of national independence was thus forfeited, the name only remaining. No one could choose but sympathise with them. Therefore while not hesitating to carry out his Imperial Master's instructions he had spared no pains to speak words of comfort to the Koreans, and to urge them into the paths of progressive endeavour, so that the day might not be far distant when the flags of Japan and Korea would float side by side, neither brighter or more honoured than the other. He had now to entreat his own countrymen, especially those whom he was addressing, since their proximity to Korea imposed on them a special responsibility—he had now to entreat them to show courtesy and consideration in their intercourse with the Koreans, and by kindness and patience to induce these people to adopt the best products of modern civilization instead of deterring them by displays of violence and arbitrariness.

Tuesday, December 5.

The Emperor has ordered a State funeral in the case of Cho Pyong-sik as well as in that of Min Kiu-hwa, and has given to the former the posthumous title of "Chhung-son" (true patriot). Concerning this intelligence the Nichi Nichi writes with its usual shrewdness. Cho Pyong-sik was undoubtedly a "true patriot" according to his own interpretation of the term. But in point of fact he disobeyed his Sovereign's instructions and adopted a course contrary to that indicated from the Throne. He was in effect a rebel. In future years his loyal services might have been recalled and publicly recognised, as was done in Japan with regard to Saigo Takamori. But to grant him a state funeral and to bestow on him an honorary title is to encourage imitation of his acts. It is rumoured that the flag at the Japanese Legation was half-masted on account of the death of Min Kiu-hwa, and this also excites the criticism of the Nichi Nichi. Min, as our readers know, received the posthumous title of "Chhungmun" (patriotic scholar). If the Japanese flag was half-masted, the cause is probably to be sought in the relationship of the deceased to the family of the late Queen. It is difficult to pronounce judgment on the propriety of such a mark of respect. The whole problem of these suicides bristles with interesting reflections.

It is stated that instructions have been issued by the Government in Berlin for withdrawing the Seoul Legation, and that the Minister will leave the Korean capital on the 15th instant. This news will be received with much satisfaction in Japan, for there is no concealing the fact that Germany's doings are regarded with some anxiety in the Far East, and that the wisest politician hesitates to predict her course in any given crisis. We have often expressed the opinion that this is merely a natural reflexion of the difficult position occupied by Germany in Europe, but it is not the explanation which concerns us immediately so much as the fact. The action now said to have been taken in Seoul will have an excellent effect in Japan. Of that there can be no doubt.

The Tonghaks have not made a success of their rising at Okchhon. It is telegraphed that their leaders have been arrested already and the insurrection quelled. These Tonghaks (Eastern Literateurs) have given a great deal of trouble in their time. They were the proximate cause of the war between China and Japan, and whenever any elements of agitation are in the air, they make their armed appearance. In the presence of Japanese troops and gendarmes they are not very powerful for mischief, but it is to be hoped that they will soon cease to be one of the normal features of Korean politics.

It is stated that the construction of this line has hitherto been deferred owing to the fact that no immediate necessity pressed for its use. The Japanese Authorities now recognise, however, that such a road is essential not only economically but also strategically, and the matter has been taken in hand earnestly. The construction is expected to cost 15 million yen. Nothing is said as to the provenance of this money. So long as the war lasted funds for building military lines were always available and these lines remain an asset of the victor. It was thus that the Seoul-Wiju road was constructed, as well as the road from Antung to Mukden, and it was thus also that the Seoul-Fusan railway work was expedited. In fact the war may be said to have brought Mukden into direct communication by rail with Fusan, and to have linked up the Korean and the Manchurian systems. But we have now returned to the days of budgets and diets, and it is not apparent where sums of 15 million yen are to be obtained for the asking.

Thursday, December 7.

The British Representative in Seoul—so the telegraph says, but as Sir John Jordan has already left the Korean capital the news must be somewhat belated—has asked the Korean Government, with Japan's concurrence, for a gold-mining concession at Thosan in Hwanghai-do.

It is stated that Mr. Yon Chhi-ho, acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, having tendered his resignation twice or thrice unsuccessfully, has now retired to the seclusion of his own residence, whence he refuses to emerge.

The ex-chief of police and the present chief of police have both been arrested by Japanese gendarmes on a charge of implication in a conspiracy connected with the despatch of an ambassador from Korea to Japan, by way of recognition of the mission of Marquis Ito.

The excitement about the new Convention has reached Chinnampo. A plot is said to have been formed to kill the Ministers concerned and rescind the Convention. Several arrests have been made.

Tokyo journals state that calm has been fully restored in Seoul and that things are now normal. Petitions continue to be received denouncing the Convention, but they are regarded as purely formal affairs, intended to foment a disturbance in which the writers themselves have no intention of participating.

The Emperor has given special instructions for the selection of a site to bury Min Yong-hwa ■ Yong-in.

VLADIVOSTOCK.

M. Pokotiloff is said to have officially informed the Chinese Government, in response to the latter's demands for the indemnification of its subjects in Vladivostock, that Russia could not recognise any obligation to indemnify, but that, as a matter of international friendship, he would submit the claims to St. Petersburg after due examination. If M. Pokotiloff has indeed taken such an attitude, his departure from the principles hitherto governing Occidental relations with China is very marked. Let us suppose the positions reversed. Let us suppose that the Chinese garrison of Chengtu mutinied and murdered a large number of the foreigners in Szchuan, plundering and destroying their property. And let us suppose that China, when confronted with demands for compensation, replied that she could not recognise any obligation to pay indemnities but that, as a matter of international benevolence, she would take the question into kindly consideration after duly investigating the amount of injury inflicted. Would not something very like ■ howl of derisive wrath be raised by all Occidental nations? M. Pokotiloff knows this quite well. He knows that the doctrine he is now said to have enunciated would, if carried into practice, deprive foreigners in China of every sense of security. Therefore we defer the pain of believing that he has been rightly reported.

It is rumoured that the prisoners recently sent from Nagasaki to Vladivostock have murdered four of their officers, and that a general revolt at the latter place is likely to occur during the present month. All intelligence goes to indicate that quiet has been restored only temporarily, if indeed it can be said to have been restored at all. One ship-master who left the place a few days ago, alleges that the Russians are not making any efforts to remove the mines sunk by the Japanese at the eastern entrance of the port, and that the western entrance is now used entirely by merchantmen, although there also four mines are known to have been moored. Accounts differ as to the losses sustained by the great German firm. The figure is now put at 2 millions of yen, whereas recently the accounts indicated something much smaller. Admiral Rojestvensky is said to be still at Vladivostock. It had been his intention to proceed at once by rail to Russia, but the line in the neighbourhood of Lake Baikal has suffered some injury and traffic is suspended. This means, of course, that the withdrawal of the troops is correspondingly delayed.

The Rassia, Gromovoi and Bogatyr left Nagasaki on the 4th instant. They are to proceed to Russia via Hongkong. Apparently the services of these vessels are not required at Vladivostock.

The North-China Daily News of the 2nd instant publishes a telegram from Vladivostock which represents a very serious state of affairs. Seventy thousand soldiers of the garrison are said to have addressed to their officers a declaration that unless by a certain day definite assurances are given as to the time when the men will be sent home and the places to which they are to be sent, they will kill the officers, wreck the town and destroy the ships in the harbour. These mutineers are said to be in possession of the forts commanding the town and the port, and it is added that they have frustrated the attempts of the officers to remove the breech-blocks of the guns. Telegraphic communication westward has been severed, but it evidently remains intact in a southerly direction.

The Asahi Shimbun, with its usual enterprise, sent a special correspondent to report upon the state of affairs at Vladivostock. His first report comes by steamer which left that port on the 29th of November. The correspondent says that all telegraphic communication between Vladivostock and the outer world was severed on the morning of the 29th and he had therefore no recourse except to write by steamer. He goes on to say that Harbin is now on fire—now meaning the 29th—and that the conflagration is said to be due to causes similar to those which produced the same catastrophe at Vladivostock. At Habarovsk also a commotion was said to have begun from the evening of the 28th, but there was no definite news. It was nevertheless supposed that trains leaving Vladivostock would not be able to travel beyond Nicholisk. The Japanese residents of Vladivostock were in no danger.

DOMESTIC POLITICS.

It is observable that the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists shows signs of coming into the same camp. They have not actually formed any union, but they have held a convivial meeting which is decidedly suggestive. Rumour alleges that the Progressists have decided to present to the Throne during the next session of the Diet a petition impeaching the Ministry's foreign policy, and that the leaders of the Seiyu-kai are resolved to support it. No definite step will be taken, however, until after the Cabinet has had an opportunity of making a statement of its foreign policy to the Diet. This would postpone the event until the middle of January, and in the meanwhile, according to the Asahi, Count Katsura will resign. These predictions are nothing more than rumours.

A vehement campaign has been inaugurated by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, the Fiji Shimpō and the Asahi Shimbun against a doctrine laid down by the Kokumin Shimbun, namely that an urgency ordinance enacted when the Diet is not in session and revoked before the Diet meets, need not be presented to the Diet for post-facto approval. The three journals above-mentioned strongly condemn such a theory, and we are entirely of their opinion. Apparently the Kokumin's idea is that the object of submitting an urgency ordinance for post-facto approval is to obtain authority for its continued operation, and that, consequently, if its continued operation, be not contemplated, no such approval is needed. Such a doctrine, if carried into practice, would be quite opposed to the spirit of the Constitution which invests the Diet with legislative authority, and can not be supposed to contemplate procedure such as might render that authority a mere empty form.

A number of the fragmentary political coteries met at the Yaokan restaurant in Asakusa (Tokyo) on the afternoon of the 3rd instant, and resolved to form a combination. There were 4 representatives of the Imperialists (Teikoku-to), 5 from the Koshin Club, 4 from the original Jiyu-to, 4 from the Unaffiliated (Mushozoku) and 2 from the Yushikai, making 19 in all. Mr. Inouye Kakugoro was among the Unaffiliated. They all agreed to combine into one party which will soon hold a meeting to celebrate its formation and announce its manifesto. We can not yet form any idea what the numerical strength of this combination will be, but we observe that Mr. Shimada Saburo of the Yushi-kai, Mr. Otake Kanichi of the Mushozoku, the members of the old Tosa-ha and 2 or 3 of the Koshin Club are said to be unlikely to join.

If all the fragmentary coteries which have hitherto occupied nominally independent positions in the political arena, cooperated to form one body, they would make quite a formidable showing. The following numbers are published:—

Imperialists	18
Koshin Club	26
Yushin-kai	15
Old Liberals	19
Unaffiliated Club	26
Unaffiliated	10
Total	114

It is not thought, however, that more than 70 will join the new union. Even 70 would be strong enough to hold the balance of power, though of course they would not represent a serious force as against the Seiyu-kai and the Progressists in alliance. Our readers presumably understand that the proposed party would be pro-government. It would, in fact, be a conservative party; the first conservative organization of any consequence that has made its appearance in Japan. The Fiji Shimpō welcomes the project of combination, but our contemporary's appreciation is somewhat contemptuous. The gist of it is that the various coteries have hitherto worked in an underhand and often questionable manner to promote the cause of the Cabinet, and that their open organization into one body will have the wholesome result of inspiring them with respect for their responsibilities as a duly registered party and will thus be a step towards a better standard of political morality.

THE LAUNCH AT KURE.

The Prince Imperial is to go to Kure for the launch of the Tsukuba. His Imperial Highness will proceed in the Iwate, which will be accompanied by the Kasagi. Admiral Togo also goes by the Iwate. The party left Yokohama on the 8th. This means evidently that the Emperor has abandoned his intention of being present at the launch.

The Tsukuba was laid down on the 14th of January 1905. She has been made almost entirely with materials obtained in Japan. Her length is 440 feet, her beam 75 feet, her displacement 13,750 tons and her horsepower 20,500. She draws 26 feet. Her construction is certainly a most remarkable achievement. She is said to be in all respects equal to the finest vessel of her type in Great Britain, and in point of celerity of construction English dockyards alone could rival Japan's time.

CHINA.

Friday, December 1.

It is reported that the point of special difficulty which had blocked the progress of the negotiations from the third meeting of the Plenipotentiaries, was finally overcome at the sixth meeting on the 28th ultimo. But what this point was, no indication is given. Statements continue to be circulated that Japan's proposals are so moderate as to be sure of obtaining the ultimate assent of the Chinese Plenipotentiaries as well as of the Chinese nation. The seventh meeting was to take place on the 29th ultimo and the eighth was fixed for the 30th. The Asahi's correspondent confirms the statement that some point of special difficulty was settled on the 28th ultimo, but he says that several matters remain to be debated. They are not, however, of cardinal importance nor do they promise to cause any serious embarrassment. The trouble is that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries are showing almost impractical solicitude about preserving their country's "face." This mood of theirs is attributed to the memorials with which the Throne has been recently bombarded; memorials all dealing with the same subject, namely, the vital necessity of avoiding any arrangement which would impair China's Sovereign status in Manchuria. The Plenipotentiaries themselves also seem ambitious of accomplishing something which will make for their own glorification, and between this desire and the pressure of that other vague obligation, they exhibit an inconvenient reluctance to do business. The same correspondent quotes a rumour to which he seems to attach some credence, namely, that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries having shown themselves too yielding, their Chinese colleagues have suddenly become inspired with courage to take advantage of the weakness thus demonstrated. But in considering such a rumour we have to remember that Baron Komura is the chief Japanese Plenipotentiary. Baron Komura knows China and the Chinese if any man knows them. Peking, as he himself said before he set out on this mission, is the arena where he made his diplomatic debut. It is quite incredible that any want of due firmness on his part can have encouraged the Chinese to assume an obdurate mien. Such as they are now showing themselves, such they were from the moment when the conference held its first meeting. In these columns it has long been urged that the exceedingly optimistic views taken by some publicists with regard to the negotiations were not warranted by such indications as reached the best informed quarters, and that the course of the conference would probably prove more protracted and less satisfactory than their appreciations suggested. The Portsmouth negotiations may be said to have been concluded in eight meetings. The Peking conference reached its eighth meeting on the 30th ultimo, yet we have no indication that it is likely to end immediately. On the other hand, there can be no comparison between the gravity of the issues in question.

The Fiji's correspondent wires that the Chinese deny having given to Russia any permission to build a line from Kirin to Changchun, and that they consequently refuse to grant this concession to Japan. It will be remembered that a few days ago news reached Tokyo in the sense that in consideration of abandoning her application for the Hsinmintun-Mukden line, Japan had obtained a concession for the Mukden-Wiju line. All these rumours must be received with great reserve. As to the Wiju-Mukden road, we believe that traffic by a military line is already open between the two places. A correspondent writing from the north-west of Mukden on the 23rd ultimo says that trains began to run between the two places from the 18th of November. A military line has only a two-foot gage, but its usefulness may be estimated from the fact that some of the permanent roads in India are of only that dimension. Thus the line linking up the Korean and the Manchurian systems may be said to be an accomplished fact, and the Chinese have always shown sweet reasonableness in the presence of accomplished facts. But the above rumour suggests that they are bent upon denying to Japan the two other concessions sought, namely, the Mukden-Hsinmintun road and the Kirin-Changchun road. We imagine that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries are likely to prove pretty insistent as to the latter.

It is related that on the 29th ultimo Viceroy Yuan issued instructions for the censorship of all telegraphic correspondence leaving Peking, but that he was induced to abandon the project owing to Japanese representations. In conveying this news the Fiji Shimpō's correspondent attributes to the Chinese Authorities sufficient good sense to discern "the folly" (gu naru) of this procedure, but truly we fail to appreciate the justice of the epithet. Why should telegraphic censorship be a prudent measure in one country's case and a silly measure in another country's? We have all submitted, with due recognition, to this kind of precaution in Japan, and if Viceroy Yuan thinks it essential to Chinese interests that every possible leakage should be stopped in Peking, is he not within his right, and who has any title to deny his discretion?

On the 28th ultimo the Japanese residents of Peking gave an entertainment in honour of Baron Komura. The Plenipotentiary's reception seems to have been most enthusiastic. In a clever speech delivered by him, he dwelt specially upon two points, namely, the fact that inter-state relations depend largely upon the relations of the individuals forming the respective nations, and that it now devolved upon the Japanese people to utilize the opportunities created for them in East Asia by the victories of their fellow-countrymen in arms and the exertions of their Government. There appear to have been two lantern processions within the enclosure of the hotel, one formed by the gentlemen, the other by the ladies, and both having for object to demonstrate applause of Baron Komura. Cheers were given for Mr. Uchida also. The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondent, in conveying this news, suggests that the entertainment may be regarded as furnishing proof that the progress of the negotiations is counted satisfactory in Peking.

Prince Tsai has presented to the Throne a memorial urging administrative reconstruction on much the same lines as those adopted by Japan after the Restoration, except that he advocates 10 departments instead of 9: namely, departments of foreign affairs, of agriculture, of law, of education, of superintendence (?), of public works, of ceremonies, of finance, and of military affairs. The Prince advocates abolition of the present system of public examination and advises that candidates for office be selected as they are in the Occident and in Japan. This is only the barest outline of his memorial. The document is said to embody the views of a large section of Chinese reformers.

Saturday, December 2.

Accounts from Peking this morning are conflicting. The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondent wires that at the eighth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries on the 30th of November all the Japanese proposals, with one or two exceptions, were satisfactorily disposed of, and the Chuo Shimbun's correspondent says that the point of difficulty was surmounted at the seventh conference on the 28th of November, and that Baron Komura's return to Japan may be expected about the 10th instant. The Nippon's information obtained from the Central News Agency, is that China has agreed to the Kirin-Changchun Railway and also to the question of Japanese railway guards, while with regard to the other railway concessions sought by Japan, the Wiju-Mukden line has been agreed to by China in consideration of Japan abandoning the Hsinmintun-Mukden connexion. On the other hand China has formulated certain demands which are giving some trouble, though on the whole the aspect of affairs is satisfactory.

The above represents the optimistic views. On the other side we have the Hochi Shimbun's correspondent, who wires that remarkable slowness is shown by the Chinese negotiators, two or three days being sometimes devoted to discussing one proposal. Thus the Conference has not yet disposed of one half of its work although Japan has made several concessions. Our contemporary, commenting on this information, expresses the opinion that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries are cleverly manipulating the news which is allowed to leak out, and that the public consequently hears nothing of what happens in the conference chamber and much of the convivial meetings which punctuate the course of the negotiations. The conference will end without any serious unpleasantness between the two Powers, but one may doubt whether the issue will be very agreeable for Japan. That is the Hochi's view. The Fiji Shimpō also writes in a pessimistic strain. It apprehends that the few advantages obtained by Japan in the Portsmouth Conference may be sacrificed on this occasion, and it ridicules the idea of Chinese statesmen that the "face" of their country would be lost if they granted railway concessions to Japan in Manchuria. It is not a highly dignified proceeding to allow foreigners to build railways in one's country, but China has been allowing it for the past 20 years, and it is rather intolerable that she should be suddenly visited by dignified qualms at the expense of Japan who has rescued her from what would have been a real disgrace and humiliation, the absorption of Manchuria into Russia's dominions. The Fiji calls for less lukewarm methods on the part of Japan's statesmen, and warns the Chinese that if they continue their sentimental procrastination and obstruction, they will ultimately have to suffer something very much worse than the conditions they are now girding at. The Asahi Shimbun alleges that Baron Komura has succeeded in nothing except in wrapping the negotiations in a cloud of secrecy, a feat in which he is strenuously assisted by Viceroy Yuan, both statesmen being equally anxious to cover up the tracks of their failures. But it would seem as though this somewhat caustic utterance is based mainly on conjecture, for the remainder of our contemporary's article may be epitomized into an expression of hope that things will turn out satisfactorily.

Sunday, December 3.

The Hochi Shimbun published on the 2nd instant an extra saying that Baron Komura had fainted while entertaining the Chinese Princes and Ministers at the Japanese Legation on the 1st instant. Other Tokyo newspapers do not confirm the statement. They say merely that the Plenipotentiary has contracted a cold, and inasmuch as he was able to attend a banquet on the evening of the 2nd, we assume that the latter version is correct. At all events the 9th meeting of the conference which was to have taken place on the afternoon of the 1st, had to be postponed until the 2nd, when it seems to have taken place duly.

Accounts continue to be conflicting as to the course of the negotiations, but there is now a confident contradiction of the rumours published by the Jiji Shimpō to the effect that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries have made considerable concessions. On the contrary it is now alleged that since the Chinese Plenipotentiaries have lost hope of concluding the negotiations within the lines of their instructions from the Throne, they will have to seek fresh instructions. We gather that the opposition comes mainly from persons not connected directly with the negotiations. Thus M. Pokotiloff is menacing the Chinese Government with all kinds of dire consequences if they concede Japan's proposals. Tang Fang, one of the five Commissioners to foreign countries, is insisting that the East Chinese Railway must be bought back. Viceroy Chang and Chow are memorializing about the sovereignty of their country in the Three Eastern Provinces, and they are supported by certain other Viceroy and Governors as well as by the Chinese students in Japan, who, it may be assumed, will by and bye prove a potent factor in China's politics. Hence the Plenipotentiaries are hampered by commotion in domestic circles rather than by the narrowness of their instructions. Still the general impression is that the most difficult points in the negotiations have been disposed of.

Viceroy Yuan is said to be planning an entertainment on a large scale to Baron Komura and his suite in Tientsin on their return journey.

The Chinese newspapers of Shanghai are reported to be writing in a tone distinctly antipathetic to Japan's claims.

Considerable diligence is said to be exercised in the compilation of new legal codes for China. Mr. Wu Ting-fang has been appointed Vice-Minister of Justice apparently for the purposes of this work. Mr. Wu, we may mention, is a barrister duly qualified in England, and he formerly served as a member of the Legislative Council in Hongkong.

Monday, December 4.

The ninth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 2nd instant and lasted three hours. Nothing is stated publicly as to its results but the correspondent of the Kokumin Shimbun wires that the rumours as to difficulties having arisen are incorrect. He alleges that Japan's proposals have hitherto received a favourable reception at the hands of the Chinese Plenipotentiaries, and that no development likely to disturb what has thus far been accomplished is likely to take place.

Baron Komura gave a banquet in the Grand Hotel on the 2nd instant. Covers were laid for sixty. All the Foreign Representatives were among the guests and the telegrams say that such a brilliant banquet was never previously seen in Peking. Sir Ernest Satow is reported to have given great assistance on account of Baron Komura's illness, and Sir Robert Hart lent the Customs Band for the occasion.

The Peiho has frozen and ships can no longer obtain access to the river.

The Russian Representative was to entertain Baron Komura at dinner on the 3rd instant.

Tuesday, December 5.

The tenth conference was held on the 3rd instant, the business being to discuss a body of proposals put forward by the Chinese Plenipotentiaries. These proposals are said to number ten and only one of them was disposed of at the meeting. The eleventh meeting was to take place on the 4th.

It is at all events evident that things are not moving rapidly. The conference has actually occupied more time than did that at Portsmouth when incomparably greater issues had to be discussed. Rumour has it (Hochi's correspondence) that although Prince Ching has refrained from attending any of the meetings of Plenipotentiaries on the ground of illness, he is really not ill at all, and is giving daily interviews to Chinese and foreign visitors. If that be true it is a deliberate slight to Japan. Viceroy Yuan is represented as having complete charge of the negotiations and as manoeuvring skilfully to avoid compliance, pretexting at one moment that the nature of Japan's proposals is calculated to estrange the sentiment of her neighbour, China, and at another that his hands are tied by the opposition of the Viceroy and Governors. Inasmuch as the views of these Viceroy and Governors were supposed to have been collected before the Plenipotentiaries met, such an attitude on the part of Yuan seems evasive rather than sincere, but the ways of diplomats are not to be measured by ordinary standards. The Governor-General of Manchuria, on his part, is credited with a scheme of monopolising the priority of mining privileges in Manchuria. His Excellency thinks, probably not without reason, that there is here a source of considerable profit, and he naturally desires to reserve it for his own countrymen. It is too much to expect, however, that Japan should restore Manchuria to China without any consideration whatever, nor does history suggest that Chinese statesmen are likely to advance such an unreasonable proposition.

Shanghai telegraphs to the Jiji Shimpō in a sense suggesting that very intimate knowledge is there possessed as to the progress of the negotiations. It is even stated that such and such clauses—numerically indicated without reference to their contents—have been discussed and settled, while others have been put back. The general synthesis is that no success whatever has attended the efforts of the Japanese negotiators thus far. A long dissertation is then wired by the correspondent as to Germany's attitude. She is supposed to be playing a very deep game, the first move in which was her recent suggestion that all the foreign troops might now be removed from Chili, every reason for their presence having disappeared. By pursuing this policy she seeks to persuade the Chinese that they have nothing whatever to fear from European Powers, and that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is a wholly superfluous document so far as concerns its provision for the preservation of the Middle Kingdom's integrity. Should China, despite these practical evidences that the Alliance establishes no claim on her gratitude, make any large concessions to one of the allies, Germany will then step forward and claim corresponding concessions for herself elsewhere.

For aught we know to the contrary that may be a clever analysis of Germany's motives, but it looks a little far-fetched. German statesmen know just as well as Chinese statesmen do that Japan's proposals now under discussion in Peking do not rely upon any present menace to China's integrity by foreign States. They are based on considerations much more solid and permanent. At all events, if our contemporary's Shanghai correspondent has wired what are merely his own political appreciations, we admire his enterprise as well as the indulgence of a journal which allows its correspondents to ventilate their private opinions by means of such an expensive medium as the electric telegraph; and if he has wired the views of somebody else, the question is, "whose views?"

The Kokumin Shimbun writes editorially on the subject of the negotiations. It adopts a most optimistic strain, ridiculing all the doubts hitherto expressed and denying all the rumours hitherto current. Such doubts and rumours are to be attributed, our contemporary thinks, to the secrecy in which the proceedings of the conference are wrapped. The only valid cause for surprise is the protracted nature of the negotiations, but even that source of query disappears when consideration is directed to the character of the matters to be discussed. Japan is not approaching China in the guise of a conqueror. She is not demanding any cessions of territory or payments of indemnities. She is merely asking China to endorse, so far as the latter is concerned, certain legitimate acquisitions derived by the former in the sequel of a sanguinary war, and she is also asking her neighbour to discuss some arrangements for giving practical effect to the policy outlined in the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, the policy of preserving China's integrity and carrying out the principle of the open door. That such negotiations should require a considerable time is natural and inevitable, but the Kokumin insists that the discussions are proceeding quite smoothly, that the Chinese statesmen are showing themselves quite reasonable and that a satisfactory issue may be expected very soon.

Confirmation comes of the news recently foreshadowed in these columns, namely, that the Antung-Mukden military railway has been opened to traffic; the opening took place on the 2nd instant, but of course trains had long been running. The road, as we have already stated, has a two-foot gage, and preparations are now being made to convert it into a 3½ feet gage. It is said that the work will not present many difficulties, though of course it must be assumed that the bridges on the military line are only temporary, and will have to be replaced by permanent structures.

Wednesday, December 6.

The eleventh meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 4th and is said to have resulted very successfully. Some question which had hitherto blocked the way—what its exact nature was we do not know—is reported to have been satisfactorily disposed of, and the indications are now in favour of an early settlement. From the various rumours circulating in Peking, the inference is that the problems of the administration of Manchuria and of the management of the Customs have provoked much discussion and that they are now disposed of, but this is largely matter of conjecture. The 5th was a dies non, and Baron Komura took the occasion to visit the Peking University. It is expected that when the main points of the convention are settled, Baron Komura will leave the details to Mr. Uchida, and will himself return to Japan via Manchuria and Korea. If such a journey suggests itself as a restful expedient the Baron ought certainly to take it, for his health demands that he should enjoy a little repose.

Thursday, December 7.

The Kokumin Shinbun gives details of Baron Komura's visit to the Imperial University on the 5th instant. Our readers are aware that Professor Hattori, a Japanese distinguished for scholarship, is head of the teaching department in this university. During luncheon, which was served after the inspection of the University had been made, Mr. Sun, Minister of Education, proposed Baron Komura's health. In the course of his speech the Minister said that China owed it to Japan's assistance that a system of education had been established which constituted the basis of the country's prosperity and strength. Baron Komura, in replying, said that he hoped the educational relations between the two empires would grow constantly closer and he prayed for the happiness and strength of China.

The Peking News, which is supposed to be a Russian organ, makes some supercilious comments on the industry shown by Baron Komura since his arrival at Peking in visiting and entertaining Chinese high personages. The newspaper calls this a very astute kind of diplomacy, thus ill concealing its unbrag at Baron Komura's success.

It is stated, and may easily be conceived, that the Russian Minister in Peking finds himself in a most embarrassing position. He is completely cut off from all communication by telegraph with the home country. Harbin also is said to be isolated, not even the Kiaktow route being open. The inference is that Harbin too is in a state of revolt, or, at any rate, of much disturbance. The profoundest sympathy must be felt with all Russian officials in foreign countries. Their anxiety must be harrowing.

Rumour says that the Empress Dowager is much opposed to the idea of guarding the railways in Manchuria with foreign troops. Her Majesty justly regards this as an infringement of Chinese sovereignty, and is desirous that the duty should be entrusted to Chinese soldiers. Unquestionably that would be more becoming and more convenient for all parties if it could be satisfactorily arranged. The difficulty is that never in the past have the Chinese shown themselves capable of preserving order in Manchuria. We have no manner of doubt that they could preserve order most effectually if they organized a proper system for the purpose. We are reminded, however, of Mr. Snodgrass' adjuration to Mr. Pickwick when the latter had fallen through the ice, "Keep yourself up for my sake." If Mr. Pickwick would not keep himself up for his own sake it wasn't very likely that he would do so for the sake of any one else, and so, if the Chinese authorities have never hitherto preserved order in Manchuria for the sake of their own people, one questions their effective volition to preserve it for the sake of the Japanese or the Russians. What is quite certain is that the whole prospect of making the Manchurian Railway a success financially depends upon the security enjoyed by passengers and owners of goods. If the line is to be exposed to constant raids by Hunghtsz, it might as well be abandoned at once.

The Hochi Shinbun hears that at the twelve meetings of the Plenipotentiaries which commenced on the 23rd of November and extended to the 6th of December, an agreement was reached with regard to all the main points of the Japanese proposals, with some two exceptions. Also the somewhat perplexing and minute proposals, eight or nine in number, formulated by the Chinese, have been for the most part disposed of and the present expectation is that the middle of the month will see everything settled. Telegrams to other Tokyo journals confirm this account, and indicate the 10th as the day when the negotiations are likely to be brought to a close. Rumour says that there was considerable discussion about the further railway-building concessions sought by Japan in Manchuria and that a compromise has been effected. This would bear out the report recently received that the Antung-Mukden and Changchun-Kirin concessions had been obtained in consideration of abandoning that from Hsinmintun to Mukden. The building of this last line, however, is essential to the completion of the system.

News has been received in Shanghai from Ningpo that the recent anti-Roman Catholic rising in T'ient'aisien, Taichou prefecture, during which a Roman Catholic Church was destroyed by the mob, has been suppressed, the turbulent inhabitants round about being completely cowed by the large number of troops which now occupy the town and village in the vicinity. Thirteen persons who had a hand in destroying the church have been arrested and peace has been restored.

A Peking letter, translated by the N.-C. Daily News, states that their Majesties the Emperor and Empress Dowager are both more than friendly in their feelings towards Japan and now take every opportunity to show it. For instance, when Baron Komura had his special audience the Emperor rose from his seat and graciously shook hands with the Baron, an act of courtesy that has never happened in the history of the Chinese Court toward foreigners. Then again, the other day, as soon as the Empress Dowager learned that Madame Uchida, wife of the Japanese Minister was indisposed, her Majesty lost no time in sending a high officer of her Court to make enquiries to show the Imperial solicitude for the Japanese lady.

It is proposed to send several of the more promising students from the military college at Peking to be trained in the English and Japanese navies.

In the North China Daily News we find the following translation of an Imperial Rescript issued to Viceroy Tsên Ch'un-hsuen on the 10th November in response to his Excellency's memorial reporting the recent massacre at Lienchou, province of Kuangtung:—"With reference to the telegram of Tsên Ch'un-hsuen to the effect that certain villagers, near the city of Lienchou, while making a procession in honour of certain local deities had started a disturbance and attacked certain missionaries there, and also giving an account of what he had done, so far, in investigating the matter, we hereby command that Shen Lin shu, the sub-prefect of Lienchou, and Lei Chên-ku, major in charge of the garrison of said city be forthwith cashiered for failure in attending to their duties. At the same time, however, these two cashiered officials are to remain in Lienchou and are given the usual limit of time to capture the criminals concerned, when caught, who must be punished to the severest extent of the law. The said Viceroy is further commanded strictly to enjoin upon all his subordinates everywhere located to exercise extra precautions in protecting Christian mission stations and their occupants, nor is any one allowed to neglect his duties therein. Finally as to the rest, the said Viceroy is permitted to do what he has recommended in his telegram."

There was a fire in Des Voeux Road, Hong-kong, on the 22nd November and it was found that the insurance on the premises amounted to $67,000. The godown-keeper and managing partner of the Chinese firm involved have been arrested, charged with arson.

According to a Peking letter, says the N.-C. Daily News, Viceroy Yuan Shih-k'ai's residence in the capital is well guarded and great care is taken for his Excellency's personal protection. In other words when any one desires an interview with his Excellency the visitor is always escorted from the entrance gate to the audience room by two of the Viceregal guards carrying rifles, who never leave his vicinity. When the interview is over the caller is then escorted in the same manner back to the entrance gate. At sunset in addition to the various courtyards and gates being patrolled by the guards several of them mount the roofs keeping watch until relieved at the end of every two hours until sunrise. In former times or, to be exact, prior to the bomb outrage, a Viceroy or Governor staying for the time in the capital was accompanied about by, at most, two body servants, while the sedan chair he rode in was generally borne by two, and at most four, bearers. This was in deference to the near vicinity of the Emperor, where even a Prince of the Imperial Blood had only from half-a-dozen to ten retainers accompanying him when he went about. But nowadays the Anarchist scare has been taken advantage of by the more important princes and high officers of the Crown to gather about them armed retainers and special guards armed to the teeth, especially in the vicinity of their residences, making things look quite warlike and lively.

Says the leading Shanghai paper:—"It is no longer a secret that Mr. J. O. P. Bland, who returned from home by the P. M. steamer Siberra, has resigned his position as Secretary of the Municipal Council, and has joined the service of the British and Chinese Corporation. Mr. Bland has done excellent work as Secretary, and his resignation is a severe loss to the community; but he will have an able successor in the present Assistant-Secretary, Mr. W. E. Leveson, who has carried on the work of the Council in the most completely satisfactory manner during Mr. Bland's absence on leave.

Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co., general managers of the Ewo Cotton Spinning and Weaving Co., Ltd., announce that the annual report to be submitted to the meeting of shareholders on the 16th of December next shows an available balance of Tls. 265,939, out of which it is proposed to pay a dividend of Tls. 8 per share, or Tls. 120,000.

There has been quite an epidemic of fires in Shanghai lately, involving the loss of much house property and several lives, besides much merchandise.

THE WITHDRAWAL FROM MANCHURIA.

The Japanese appear to have completed all their arrangements for withdrawal from Manchuria. The First Army will all have reached home before the depth of winter, and the Second Army will make the journey during the winter. Hence considerable preparations have had to be made for the accommodation of this Second Army en route but they have been entirely effected. The Third Army has to spend much of the winter in Manchuria and consequently supplies of winter clothing have already been despatched and all necessary precautions taken. Our correspondence from the front says:—"The Kobi (second reserves) are all sent back first, and they may be said to have now disappeared from Manchuria. At present the Guards and the First Division are busily entraining every day. The Yobi (first reserves) are not to be despatched independently of the troops with the Colours. All will return together and be bulked in the Divisional barracks. The Third Army will probably commence its return from the close of February. * * * All the troops, except the general officers, travel in goods wagons. It is pretty cold work. I made a trip from Mukden to Haicheng in this way on Nov. 16th to superintend the transport of articles left at the latter place when my Division was moving up to Liaoyang. The journey occupied about 13 hours. The great size of the buildings erected by the Russians at Liaoyang clearly indicates the magnitude of their Manchurian programme. One is astonished to see a water-tank of over 20,000 cubic feet capacity constructed solidly of brick on an eminence 40 to 50 feet high. It is also notable that the Russians invariably placed their stations far away from the Chinese towns, their evident object being to attract the Chinese toward their site and thus bring about the reconstruction of the towns after Russian models. It is the Japanese merchants, however, who are now doing the building. There are some 200 Japanese residents at Liaoyang and 50 at Haicheng. * * * The work of transporting the soldiers goes on very rapidly. Ten trains start daily for Dalny and other places, each train carrying at least 900 men. They are in luggage vans carefully covered and they seem pretty comfortable, 32 in each van. It does not appear, however, that the Russians are making similar progress with their arrangements and the present belief is that they will not be able to carry out the programme laid down for the first evacuation period, which ends on the 30th of December. They seem to be specially busy destroying the various fortifications erected by them, their haste in this matter being apparently dictated by a desire to eliminate every trace of the works before any Japanese military men find an opportunity to examine them. The Asahi's correspondent says that the sound of explosions is perpetually conveyed to the Japanese positions, and that the impression conveyed is like thunder rolling in the distance.

THE IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY.

The resignation of the President of the Imperial University has been followed by the resignation of several of the principal professors, and several others are likely to take the same course. This is in connexion with the removal of Professor Tomizu from his chair in consequence of his political activity. The President of the University resented this exercise of authority on the part of the Educational Department, but being unable to obtain any hearing for Professor Tomizu he has now resigned. It is expected that this trouble will assume considerable dimensions.

The topic of the hour in Tokyo is the ferment in the Imperial University. Immediately on the heels of President Yamakawa's resignation has followed the resignation of Professor Matsui, the newly appointed President. President Yamakawa is a man of the highest reputation. People in Japan talk with admiration of the "Three Yamakawas," namely, the elder brother, the late Major-General Yamakawa, who fought so bravely in the Aizu war and in the Satsuma insurrection; the younger brother, Professor Yamakawa Kenjiro, and the sister, Miss Yamakawa, now Marchioness Oyama. Professor Yamakawa was universally recognised as a most fitting President, but it does not appear that Professor Matsui is thought to possess equal qualifications for the post and he has consequently resigned it almost immediately on appointment. We gather that this step on his part was due to representations made by his fellow-professors. It can scarcely have been altogether voluntary, for we must assume that the post was not conferred on him without his own consent in the first instance. The origin of the whole commotion is the Tomizu affair. Professor Tomizu was prominent among the Seven Professors who published such strong views about foreign politics on the eve of the war and again during its progress. The Educational Department finally deprived Professor Tomizu of his chair. The President may not have altogether approved of the conduct of Professor Tomizu, but he apparently read the regulations in the sense that without a representation from the President of the University the Minister of Education is not competent to remove the higher officials of the institution, and he consequently tendered his resignation. This was in August. A kind of compromise appears to have been subsequently reached, Professor Tomizu being appointed instructor in Roman Law under the authority of the President, and being thus re-instated in his duties though deprived of his professorial chair. The public imagined that the trouble had thus been settled, but suddenly in December the resignation of President Yamakawa was accepted and Professor Matsui was nominated in his place. There is here a hiatus in the story; namely, the absence of any explanation of the fact that a resignation tendered in August should have remained unaccepted until December, and should then have been suddenly acted on. Some explanation, however, must exist, and we are inclined to think that a dispute as to the proper rendering of the regulations (Bungen-ri) concerning the position of officials has been going on all the while, and that the Minister of Education, acting on behalf of the Cabinet, adopted an interpretation which the Professors of the University considered incompatible with the efficient discharge of their duties as well as with their right of freedom of speech. Professor Matsui probably accepted office as an exponent of the Minister's views, whereas he subsequently found himself entirely out of touch with his colleagues. The Fiji Shimpō, indeed, puts a different construction on the incident. It claims that the Government declined to accept President Yamakawa's resignation in the first instance because in the then existing state of commotion the wisest policy seemed to be one of conciliation. They kept the resignation by them, however, and signified their acceptance of it when, calm having been restored, they considered themselves masters of the situation. Such a policy would be at once undignified and time-serving as the Fiji fully recognises. But we are obliged reluctantly to confess that the Fiji's inveterate antipathy towards the present Cabinet ever since the Portsmouth peace has assumed dimensions which deprive the great journal of the high credit it once enjoyed for mental equilibrium and dispassionate judgment. Its versions of matters in which the Ministry are concerned, must now be taken with reserve whereas formerly they could be credited implicitly.

A large number of the Professors of the Imperial University held a meeting on the 4th instant to consider the present situation. Professor Terao (Hisashi), brother of Professor Terao Toru who is one of the "Seven," addressed the meeting in the sense that the removal of the President of the University without assigning any reason was a violation of the sanctity which essentially belonged to such an institution. Professor Tanakadate, while expressing profound astonishment at the conduct of officialdom, considered that such arbitrariness (boman) was a matter for congratulation since it would rouse the University to assert its independence. A special committee was appointed to draft a resolution. It is stated that Professor Matsui's acceptance of the post of President in succession to Professor Yamakawa was due to a misapprehension; he imagined that the change was made in consequence of Professor Yamakawa's ill health and he resigned at once on learning the truth. The main body of the Professors decided, however, that if they all resigned en masse, their action would not only assume the character of a strike, which would be undignified, but must also cause much inconvenience to the students who were under their charge. They considered, therefore, that the resignations should be confined to those directly concerned and to the Head of the Law College.

Three Professors were appointed to carry representations to the Minister of Education and to the Prime Minister. That to the Minister of Education is a document of considerable length but its gist may be briefly expressed, namely, that, according to the view of the signatories, the Minister had declined to receive President Yamakawa's resignation in August last, when the public mind was much inflamed, and had then suddenly accepted it so soon as things were calm. This, it will be seen, is the view attributed to the faculty of the University by the Fiji Shimpō, a view which we regarded as scarcely credible. Nevertheless nothing transpired at the above meeting to indicate that there had been any ostensible cause for the unlooked for acceptance of the President's resignation more than three months after the time of its original presentation. The above representation has not yet been presented. Neither has that to the Prime Minister, which also is couched in very strong terms. It declares that the independence of the University and freedom of learning are absolutely essential, and that the Minister of Education has interfered with both. The signatories therefore call for his removal from office.

There are at present no indications how this affair will end, and without hearing the version of the Minister of State for Education it is hard to form any opinion. Meanwhile the Professors in the Kyoto University are showing signs of taking up the cause of their Tokyo confreres but they have not yet actually sent in any resignations. Rumour says that they will await the attitude finally taken by the Minister of Education.

ACCIDENT TO MR. E. EDDISON.

Mr. E. Edison was the victim of an accident on Saturday which might have resulted much more seriously. He was riding an Australian horse on the Bluff which after one attempt to bolt threw him at the side of the road against the wall of the American Naval Hospital. Assistance was at once available and Mr. Edison was carried into the British Naval Hospital where he was examined by Dr. Moon, R.N. It was found that he had sustained severe though not serious injuries, including a scalp wound, lacerations to the arms and wrist and contusions. It was thought advisable that Mr. Edison should stay at Dr. Moon's overnight though he is reported to be progressing favourably.

FIELD-MARSHAL MARQUIS OYAMA.

In spite of the heavy rain which fell on the forenoon of the 7th an immense crowd assembled at Shimbashi and in its neighbourhood to receive Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama and his Staff. Two whole Divisions—the Guards and the First Division—furnished the guard of honour and lined both sides of the streets from Shimbashi to the Sakurada entrance of the Palace. At the station the Prince Imperial and the Elder Statesmen met the returning officers. After a brief time devoted to greetings, the Field-Marshal and his Staff entered open carriages and drove to the Palace, the crowds cheering lustily as they passed and a salute of 21 guns being fired in the Hibiya Park, whence also fireworks were constantly discharged. After presenting his report the Marquis, General Baron Kodama and the other principal officers of the staff, lunched with His Majesty. They then proceeded to the Head Quarter Staff, where a crown of laurels was presented to the Field-Marshal and photographs were taken.

All the Tokyo journals write articles of eulogistic welcome. The Nichi Nichi affirms that the Japanese armies owed their success largely to the wise tact of the Field-Marshal who knew how to choose his men and to coordinate their actions. It was thus that an immense dyke of Japanese soldiers, extending from the banks of the Yalu to the banks of the Liao, swept the Russians out of southern Manchuria, never allowing them to find an exit anywhere. The Jiji dwells on the great labour endured by the commander-in-chief during 15 months in the field, and is specially struck by the fact that in spite of the great victories won by them, the commanders of the Navy and Army have shown themselves entirely free from any trace of pride. Such is the disposition of the true bushi. The Asahi Shinbun calls Marquis Oyama Mokugensui (silent Field Marshal) as Admiral Togo has been called Damari-Togo (silent Togo). These are the men of few words and great deeds whom the country has to thank for its good fortune. The Asahi recalls also the fact that Oyama together with a great majority of Japan's most distinguished Generals and Admirals are Satsuma men. In the Kokumin's editorial the only noteworthy points made are that an army so uniformly victorious as the Manchurian army of Japan has seldom found a place in historical records, and that if this great result was primarily due to the valour and loyalty of the troops, it could never have been achieved without thoroughly able commanding officers.

Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, Commander-in-chief of the Manchurian Armies, returning from the front, passed Hiranuma Railway Station on Dec. 7th, on his way to Tokyo. The train arrived at Hiranuma at 9.26 a.m. It was drawn by locomotives decorated with flags of the Rising Sun; after which came a car containing the battery for the electric light; then three carriages filled with petty officers, non-commissioned officers and men, numbering about 238, belonging to the Head-quarters; then a carriage with smoking and sleeping compartments, the entrances to which were decorated with evergreens and chrysanthemums; followed by the carriage for Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, General Baron Kodama, Chief Staff Officer of the Manchurian armies, and twenty-six other staff officers. This carriage was also decorated with evergreens and chrysanthemums together with bunting; a dining car; five other carriages for officers, men and luggage completed the train. The platform and station were crowded by people to welcome the generalissimo and his party. The usual flags were hung out despite the heavy rain that fell, while many bands and troops of children and city officials were lined up to salute the Field-marshal. When the train approached, Governor Suifu, Mayor Ichihara, and many other officials of the local government, and representatives of various public bodies proceeded to the carriage of Marquis Oyama. The Governor and the Mayor, on behalf of the citizens, offered congratulations on the triumphal return of the Marquis. General Kodama—Marquis Oyama was not visible and it is believed that he was resting quietly in the saloon—returned thanks for the courtesies and asked that their thanks be given to the citizens for the warm welcome accorded. Meanwhile several beautiful day fire-works were sent up and enthusiastic bansais were raised on every hand. After a stay of three or four minutes, the train left for Kanagawa. The train passed through this station at the usual speed, but in spite of there being no stoppage the place was crowded. The populace raised an enthusiastic bansai. The train arrived at Shimbashi at 10.30 a.m. There the party were welcomed at the platform by the Cabinet Ministers and other high Palace officials, high officers of the Navy and Army; the Vice-Ministers and Secretaries of various Departments, and members of the Upper and Lower Houses, the members of the City Office; journalists, representatives of various societies and public bodies, beside many princes and princesses of the blood, peers, and ladies.

Subsequently, the Commander-in-Chief and his staff left for the palace in the following order:—

- 1st carriage.—Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama, and Lieut.-Colonel Ono.
 - 2nd.—General Baron Kodama and Major Watanabe.
 - 3rd.—Major-General Iguchi, and Major Furukawa.
 - 4th.—Major-General Matsukata and Major Takayanagi.
 - 5th.—Lieut.-Colonel Tanaka, Major Ichinose and Captain Aki.
 - 6th.—Lieut.-Colonel Koike, Major Soda, and Captain Ozawa.
 - 7th.—Major Mihara, and Kawasaki, and Capt. Fujisaki.
 - 8th.—Surgeon-General Koike and Surgeon-Colonel Kawanishi.
 - 9th.—Paymaster-General Kabayama and Paymaster-Colonel Imai.
 - 10th.—Lieut.-Colonel Ashiura, Major Okabe, and Captains Kawaguchi and Kawakami.
- The remainder proceeded by jinrikisha: Surgeon-Colonel Murakami, Capt. Matsuyama of Gendarmes, Paymasters Tsurufuchi, Sudzuki and Sakai; Lieutenants Miyake and Mori, Paymaster Tsujii, Professor Ariga, adviser in international law, and Mr. Iida of the War Office.

At the Palace the following distinguished persons were present: Marquis Yamagata, Chief of the Staff; Count Katsura, Premier; Counts Inouye and Matsukata, elder statesmen; General Terauchi, Minister for War; Baron Yamamoto, Minister for the Navy; Viscount Ito, Chief of the Naval Staff Office; Admiral Ijuin, Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff Office; General Nagaoka, Vice-Chief of the Staff Office; Surgeon-Generals Sameyoshi and Koike; Paymaster-General Sotomatsu; Surgeon-Admiral Murakami; Major-Generals Usakawa, Murata, Osawa and Hongo, and some high officers of the Imperial Headquarters. The Emperor was attended by the Crown Prince, and other princes.

THE RUSSIAN TROOPS.

Governor-General Chou is said to have reported to the Peking Government that the Russian troops in Manchuria are returning to places already evacuated by them. Fenghwa is specially mentioned. Three thousand men are reported to have suddenly made their re-appearance there to the profound consternation of the inhabitants. This is not to be read in the sense of a re-occupation. The Russians are not under any conventional obligation to evacuate the Fenghwa district before the end of December, and their comings and goings there can not be challenged until that period has elapsed. The fact appears to be that owing to the disturbed state of affairs in the home country the army in Manchuria finds itself insufficiently supplied with provisions and the men are consequently driven to looting on a large scale. It is evident that a terribly serious state of affairs might arise at any moment from this cause. If Russia be in a state of unrest and confusion such as is reported, or such as seems not unlikely to arise, the immense force in Manchuria may be reduced to almost complete destitution and a calamity might be witnessed of appalling dimensions. One shrinks from contemplating a catastrophe so shocking, but if it be true that the railway service has had to be suspended in consequence of an injury to the line, the carriage of provisions and winter clothing must be at a stand-still. The Russians, according to all accounts, were already not too well equipped, and it is hard to see how duties demanding highly elaborated and perfectly working administrative mechanism can be performed by officialdom in Russia as she is to-day. A telegram to the Asahi says that all telegraphic communication between Russia and China is now suspended, and behind the veil thus dropped upon the scene a tragedy of very large dimensions may be acted presently or may even now be in process of acting.

SCHOOL DISTURBANCE.

A serious disturbance is reported in the Second Middle School of Tosa Prefecture. Briefly speaking the affair was a recrudescence of that old source of trouble in Japanese schools, dissatisfaction of students on account of incompetent teachers, or, at any rate, teachers whom they consider incompetent. At the Tosa School the fifth-year students asked for a change of teachers in the section of natural philosophy and declared that unless their application were complied with they would cease to take part in the control of the junior students. Some shifting of teachers was effected, but the lads, deeming it quite insufficient, announced their resolve to abandon their functions. Seven teachers who preserved the entire confidence of the students intervened, and for a moment quiet was restored; but at a meeting subsequently held for the purpose of discussing the situation, the head of the school seems to have given some offense to the lads, and they called upon him to apologise. He declined to do so, whereupon they were on the point of resorting to violence which threatened to prove deadly when the seven teachers interfered and, aided by the gymnastic instructors, were able to restore order. The final sequel of the disturbance is not stated. Apparently a feeling exists that there is some defect in the management of the present educational authorities, but for our own part we are disposed to think that the prime source of the trouble is to be sought in the extremely parsimonious system pursued towards teachers in Japanese schools. The salaries paid are so petty and so much inferior to the emoluments obtainable in almost any other profession, that the best men naturally shrink from adopting a pedagogic career, and the wonder is, not that a few of the teachers fail to win the respect and confidence of their students, but that so many teachers succeed under such circumstances.

MILITARY ITEMS.

When the Tango Maru, having on board Field Marshal Marquis Oyama and his staff, passed Shimonoseki on the 2nd, there was a great demonstration. The vessel anchored for a short time, and a number of steamers put off to welcome the illustrious visitors. The Field Marshal is described as looking well though somewhat thin.

The leading citizens of Tokyo held a meeting on the 2nd instant and decided to organize a grand entertainment in honour of Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama and his Staff. It was decided that the duty of organizing the affair should be entrusted to Baron Senge, the Governor, Baron Shibusawa and Mr. Ozaki, the Mayor. By these three gentlemen twenty Managers were appointed, among them being Baron Otori, Mr. Okura, Viscount Soga, Mr. Sonoda, Mr. Soma, Mr. Soyeda, Mr. Matsuo, Mr. Shoda and other prominent men.

Lt.-General Asada, who commands the Guards Division, arrived at Shimbashi a few minutes after one o'clock on the 3rd. It need scarcely be said that he received a grand welcome. He and his staff proceeded at once to the Palace, calling at the Head Quarter Staff en route. There were two companies forming a guard of honour, and the Guards Division was drawn up outside the Sakurada Gate as the General passed.

Field Marshal Marquis Oyama and his Staff received a great ovation at Ni-no-shima on the 3rd instant. Ni-no-Shima is the Medical Inspection Station for Ujina. In speaking to press representatives the Marquis thanked them for what they had hitherto done and bespoke their continued assistance in connexion with post-bellum measures. At Ujina the Field Marshal was welcomed by Prince Takatsukasa on behalf of the Emperor, Major-General Usagawa on behalf of General Terauchi and Colonel Matsushita on behalf of Marquis Yamagata. The party is to remain two days at Hiroshima and will leave that place on the 5th, so as to reach Tokyo on the 7th.

It will be observed from the Budget that the Government has given up the idea, recently discussed, of increasing the army to 20 Divisions, and has decided to limit the addition to the four newly raised Divisions. Thus the total strength of the Army will be 17 Divisions, including the Guards, whereas it was 13 when the war commenced. With regard to the head quarters of these Divisions, rumour says that they will be as follows:—Thirteenth Division at Matsuyama (Shimane Prefecture); Fourteenth at Yamagata; Fifteenth in Hokkaido (at some point near Saghalien); and Sixteenth uncertain. There is an idea that the three mixed brigades now forming the Formosan Garrison may possibly become the Sixteenth Division with head quarters at Taihoku (Taipei).

It is pointed out that the Japanese Armies in Manchuria this winter will be circumstanced very differently from what they were last winter. They will have to remain there, it is true, throughout a considerable part of the cold season—except the First Army, which will all have returned home by the end of this month—but instead of camping out in the open or seeking some measure of warmth by digging holes in the ground and taking refuge in them, the men will be quartered in the solidly built houses of the inhabitants and will thus suffer little hardship.

Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama says—according to a newspaper reporter—that the Navy having been so sumptuously welcomed, their comrades of the Army are entirely satisfied and will be quite content to dispense with any public demonstration. That is a fine spirit, but of course the citizens of Tokyo will not agree to make any discrimination of the kind. Preparations on a great scale are in progress. The newspapers of the capital say that a sum of 300,000 yen is in sight for the purposes of the entertainments, of which there will have to be fully eight, since it is expected that about 190,000 men of all arms will pass through the capital from first to last. It is an exceedingly difficult matter to welcome the troops as they deserve to be welcomed, for they are arriving in an almost continuous stream of detachments, each too small for any considerable ovation, and though the enthusiastic industry of the citizens is so great that bands and banner-bearers seem to be perpetually parading the streets, it is inevitable that the warmth of these detached welcomes should wane. People's fervour can not be kept at fever heat week after week, and once or twice we have ourselves seen with much pity a small body of returning heroes making their way at night through streets silent except for the sound of their own bugles. As between the two services it would be hard indeed to decide which suffered more hardships, won grander victories or conferred higher lustre on the Empire's reputation. No expense that Tokyo incurs to welcome these noble sons of the nation could be deemed excessive.

All the Tokyo journals publish an account, said to be derived from official sources, showing the casualties in the war. The figures are as follow:—

CASUALTIES FROM FIGHTING.

Killed in action or died of wounds.....	43,219
Wounded in action	153,673
Missing	5,081
Injured (not in action)	16,456

Total 218,429

CASUALTIES FROM DISEASE.

Sick (ordinary diseases)	263,270
Sick (contagious diseases)	17,866

Total 221,136

Grand Total 439,565

Sent from the field to hospitals in Japan ... 281,587
Recovered and resumed their places in the ranks 60,000

One of the main points of interest in connexion with these figures is the total of killed, namely, 43,219, to which, however, must be added a large proportion of the missing (5,081), so that we may take 48,300 as a close approximation to the aggregate of deaths in action. This number will astonish many people. It has been repeatedly alleged that the killed at Port Arthur alone totalled some fifty thousand, and the theory has been maintained in spite of the obvious fact that such an estimate would mean the total extinction of a much larger force than the whole army collected by Japan for the investment of the fortress. To find the total number of deaths, those from disease must of course be added. But this figure has not yet been published, and we have no data for expressing an opinion. Even if we assume that as many perished from disease as those that fell in the fight, the grand total would not exceed 90,000, a figure less by nearly 40,000 than the German losses in the war of 1871.

The destroyers Hayakase and Asatsuyu will be launched on Jan. 28 and at the beginning of February respectively at the Sakurajima Ship-building Yard, Osaka.

MARQUIS ITO.

Referring to Marquis Ito's return to Tokyo, the Shogyo Shimpo writes enthusiastically. It refers to the history of the relations between Japan and Korea since the days of the Empress Jingoo and to the fact that within the past ten years Japan has been obliged to fight twice on Korea's account. The action now taken would not have been possible had not it been preceded by a series of events which induced the Powers to recognise and practically acknowledge Japan's titles. But even then, there is good reason to doubt whether a satisfactory arrangement could have been effected with Korea had not the services of Marquis Ito been available as negotiator. Marquis Ito possesses an essential requisite, a requisite of which he may almost be said to have the monopoly, namely, the full confidence of his own Sovereign and nation and the full confidence of the Korean court and the Korean people. He has accomplished a work which contributes conspicuously to the maintenance of peace, and which may be said to satisfy the desires of many generations of his countrymen. The Kokumin Shinbun writes in a similar strain. It says that he has restored confidence to the Japanese people; has restored confidence to the Japanese nation; and has effected a settlement which all foreign Powers regard with confidence. These results are due to the ability, the experience and the prestige of Japan's veteran statesman.

THE TOKYO ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Tokyo Electric Railway Company held its semi-annual meeting on the 30th ultimo, when the following statement of accounts was read and passed:—

Net Profit for the half year	yen. 42,161
Carried over from last term	14,901
Total	57,062
To Legal Reserve	2,108
To Special Reserve	2,108
Rewards to officials	2,800
Dividend (2½ per cent. per annum; namely 62½ sen on each old share and 37½ sen on each new one)	49,000
Carried forward	1,046
Total	57,062

The Directors in their report stated that they had applied for concessions for two more lines, namely:—

1. A line from Amashiro-cho (No. 2), Azabu to Zaimoku-cho in Azabu via Sakashita-cho, Miyashita-cho and Higakubo-cho.
2. A line from Hiroo-machi, Azabu, to Kurama-cho in Shiba via Matsuzaka-cho and Isarago-machi in Mita.

They have further applied for the cancellation of the concessions:—

1. From Shibaguchi (Itcho-me) in Shiba at the junction of the Tokyo Densha Railway to Shimbashi Station.
2. From Futabacho in Shiba to the north corner of Uchisaiwai-cho (2 chome) in Kojimachi. (The reason for this cancellation is that a different connexion has been made in the district with the round-the-moat line.)

Finally they have applied for the following changes:—

- 1.—To change the line between the corner of Shiba Futabacho No. 14 round the corner at No. 1 in the same to Dobashi, for a line from the east side of the Koga Railway through Futabacho to Dobashi.
- 2.—To change the line between Ochanomizu Bridge in Hongo and Matenzumi-cho in Kanda to a line between Ochanomizu Bridge and Yushima 4 chome through Yushima sanchome. This changed line to be constructed after the City Improvement has been accomplished.

MR. WILLIAM CARMICHAEL.

"Mr. William Carmichael was serving as Chief Engineer of the S. S. Sado Maru when the Russian cruisers attempted to sink her in the Sea of Japan on the 15th of June, 1904. When he and the other foreign members of her crew transferred themselves to the enemy's vessel which had as she supposed, given the Sado her coup de grace, they had little expectation of reaching Vladivostok alive—we quote from an interview which a representative of a Japanese paper had with Mr. Carmichael on board the Kanagawa Maru, the steamer that has just carried him back to Japan. They considered it inevitable that the Russians should fall in with a Japanese Squadron on the voyage northward, in which event they did not question what the result would be. That expectation was not fulfilled, however. The cruisers reached Vladivostok safely and Mr. Carmichael with his comrades were duly sent by rail to Tomsk. There they found several Japanese prisoners who were not a little surprised at the arrival of foreigners to join their company. Chief among the prisoners were Commander Mizuoguchi, of the Imperial Navy, and Captain Sakurai, of the Army. These officers, foreseeing a long spell of confinement and holding that it was the duty of themselves and their fellow-prisoners not to spend the time in idleness but to devote it to acquiring some knowledge likely to be of use to the country, proposed that classes should be formed for the study of foreign languages and all the prisoners gladly fell in with the scheme. Three classes were formed; one for French under Commander Mizuoguchi, one for Russian under Captain Sakurai, and one for English under Mr. Carmichael. The hours were from 8 to 12 in the forenoon and from 9 to 10 at night. Mr. Carmichael says that the men applied themselves with the greatest assiduity and that the progress they made was something quite remarkable. He derived the impression that the people of this country are capable of such earnest application as to fully account for their great national successes. As for the attitude of the Russian officials, what was chiefly to be complained of was their want of system. Their instructions differed from day to day. In the morning one order would be given for the guidance of the prisoners and in the afternoon it would be rescinded. It was impossible to know how to proceed. But beyond this Mr. Carmichael has no subject of complaint, so far as we can see, and he says that nothing could have been kinder than the behaviour of the Russian inhabitants of Tomsk towards the prisoners.

THE BRITISH CABINET.

Telegrams to-day speak of Mr. Balfour's resignation as a fact and begin to name the members of the new Administration. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman will, without doubt, be the future Prime Minister. He is now sixty-nine years of age and is leader of the Liberal party in the House of Commons, having in the past held office twice as Financial Secretary to the War Office, as Secretary to the Admiralty, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, and twice as Secretary for War. He has represented the Stirling District since 1868.

Mr. Asquith, who is named for the Exchequer, has been Home Secretary (1892-5) and enjoys the confidence of the Liberal Party in a high degree. He has represented East Fife since 1886 and is only 53 years of age.

Sir Edward Grey, who has sat for Berwick-on-Tweed since 1885, was Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in 1892-95. He is one of the "young" men of the Liberal Party, having been born in 1862, is regarded as a safe leader, and is a general favourite.

The Earl of Elgin is the immediate descendant of that nobleman who was plenipotentiary to China and a distinguished Viceroy of India, and of the Earl of Elgin who was Ambassador to Turkey and collected the Elgin Marbles. The present earl has been Viceroy of India.

THE HOUSE TAX.

Although Tokyo papers have stated that the house-tax question in all its details has been settled by the Japanese Government and that the nature of the decision will be proclaimed in a few days, we can not discover that things have gone quite so far as that would suggest. It would seem that the local authorities have not yet fully answered the questions submitted from Tokyo as to the exact amount of the house tax and cognate imposts, and pending their answer nothing can be definitely decided. There has apparently been some reference to the Cabinet but the result will not be published immediately, and indeed it is reported that no official communication will be addressed during the present year to the Representatives of the three European countries concerned directly in the case, namely, Germany, France and Great Britain. In all probability the taxes hitherto collected will be paid back in a lump sum with interest at the legal rate of 5 per cent, but there is some talk of instalments. The amount is said to be about 300,000 yen. Some part will be paid by local communes, but probably the bulk will come out of the Treasury. Rumour says that the disposition of the Japanese Government is to interpret the finding of the arbitration tribunal in as wide a sense as possible, so as to settle once for all this vexed question and to remove every cause of complaint.

"LA MATTCHICHE"

London and Paris are revelling in the delights of a new dance which has been evolved in Paris from motifs found latent in some old Brazilian and Spanish dances. In Paris it is called "La Mattchiche"; in London it is known as "Maxixe," and it can be danced by two or four persons. The musical rights have been secured in Great Britain and the Colonies by Messrs. Chappell and Co., Ltd., the well known music-publishers of 50, New Bond Street, London, and to them we are indebted for a copy of the music and a description of the dance. One London critic, who saw the new dance at the Prince of Wales' theatre, wrote regarding it:—"What has most charmed London audiences is the life, the freshness, and the abandon of the dance. The movements of the executants are animated and brisk; but there are none of the grotesque eccentricities of the cake walk in the Maxixe."

That Yokohama residents may gather some idea of the dance, and perchance introduce it into local programmes, we quote the description of it from the pen of M. Eugenio, Master of the Ballet of the Alcazar Theatre, Paris:—

8^{eme}.—Mouvement General.—Les couples se détachent et les cavaliers reprenant la taille de la dame de la main droite, de la main gauche soutiennent le bras droit et font en sautant (pas de galop) le tour de la salle sans quitter cette position.

MR. TAKAHIRA ON AMERICAN WOMEN.

The Japanese Representative in Washington has contributed to Woman's Home Companion for November an essay on American women, from which the following is an extract:—

"In the past two eventful years, I have been made to see two traits which are conspicuous among the many remarkable attributes of the intelligent American woman. The first is the tenacity with which she holds to her convictions. This stand out in no uncertain outline. If she does not compass every detail, she certainly takes good care that what she has in her grasp does not escape her. That is not all. She sees to it that the same conviction is somehow conveyed to the minds of her friends. Once she is thoroughly possessed with a conviction and once in the arena, I know of no missionary who can claim the distinction of being her superior in zeal and ability.

"She has all the advantage of a charming personality with which to back up her conviction. In championing a cause, hers is no preachment on paper. An eloquent essay is but an eloquent essay after all; an eloquent speech, an eloquent speech. In fashioning and fostering public opinion they are as different from the power of the American woman as life is different from a marble statue. It would perhaps be difficult for even a gifted historian to trace accurately all the national and international events to the salons and boudoirs whence they came; but it would be very much more difficult to prove that these epochal events have had nothing to do with the gentler hours of a nation's life, with silken arenas, with smiles and whispers behind fans. And in America this fact seems to be so emphasized by the exceptionally high intelligence of the American woman that I do not see how any one can, with grace, deny it. And the second thing that has impressed me deeply is the daring of the American woman. The courage—her enemy might almost say recklessness—with which she drives home her conviction to its logical end is superb. A statesman in the thick of affairs often thinks of too many things. She thinks of one, she has no eyes for anything else. And when she enters upon a battle she knows of no such convenience as compromise; nothing short of a complete victory is likely to please her grace.

"There are several who would have us believe that a sentiment such as friendship is an empty sound, especially in international affairs. I fear that I am in the happy land of illusion in the estimation of them. Whenever I think of the absolute selfishness of the American friendship for us, I can not restrain myself from turning over in my mind the work which has been accomplished by the enlightened womanhood of America. May it not be true that this peculiar feature of our friendship, so foreign to the self-interest basis of diplomacy, has had its root in the work of the American woman, who is not always the best hand to count how much superior is the value of steel exports to Japan over so airy a substance as an international friendship? The sympathy of the American woman is not a sympathy originated merely from the consideration of self-interest or any weakness of womanhood, but based upon the substantial foundation of strong religious faith, high education, and good judgment."

THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

The Official Gazette publishes particulars of the changes involved in the creation of ambassadorial posts. The ambassadors are to be shimin officials and the Councillors of Embassy will rank with but below Ministers Plenipotentiary. There will also be Secretaries of Embassy ranking with but above First Secretaries of Legation and with but above Consuls-General. The salary of an ambassador will be 5,000 yen—hitherto the highest salary of a Minister has been 4,000 yen—with contingent allowance of 30,000 yen—the Ministers' allowance is 26,000 yen. The Councillors of Embassy will be from 3,500 to 4,000 yen, with entertainment allowances of 12,000 yen. Secretaries will have from 2,200 to 2,500 yen.

Viscount Hayashi has been appointed Ambassador in London; Count Mutsu has been named First Secretary of Embassy; Messrs. Koike and Kameyama, Second Secretaries; and Commander Kaburagi, Naval Attaché.

Nothing is yet definitely stated or confidently reported about the establishment of embassies in Washington, Paris, Berlin and St. Petersburg.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

It is stated the Emperor will be present at the launching of the first-class armoured cruiser Tsukuba on the 12th instant at Kure.

Mr. Kono Hironaka and his five fellow-suspects have been released on bail of 200 yen each. It is expected that they will be remanded by the Court of First Instance, and that even if condemned at their public trial they will escape punishment owing to the issue of an amnesty which is expected in connexion with the restoration of peace.

A garden party was given by Admiral Togo and Vice-Admirals Kataoka, Kamimura and Dewa, at the Naval Club on the afternoon of the 2nd instant. No ladies were invited, and in spite of their absence the entertainment proved a signal success.

By pure inadvertence we omitted from our review of the Rev. J. Batchelor's Ainu Grammar the name of the publishers. The book is published by the Methodist Publishing House, No. 3, Shichome, Ginza, Tokyo.

News has been received of the sudden death of Baron von Gutschmid, formerly German representative at the Court of Japan.

On the 3rd instant Captain Gunji arrived at Tsuruga in Echizen by the steamer Kisho Maru. He had come direct from Vladivostok and he proceeded without delay to Tokyo. There is no news of his experiences.

PLAGUE.

Owing to the existing symptoms of pest in Kobe, the Russians have asked that the prisoners who were to have been handed over at that place, should be carried to Yokkaichi instead. Preparations had not been made, of course, at Yokkaichi, and consequently a little delay may be entailed.

According to an official telegram, two fresh cases of bubonic plague appeared on Nov. 30th in Kobe. One of the patients is a man residing in Yawata-dori, and another is a woman in Sannomiya.

Owing to the prevalence of the disease in Kobe, Lieut.-General Daniloff, Russian Commissioner, has asked the Japanese authorities not to deliver prisoners in that city but in Yokohama or Nagasaki.

On Dec. 3rd, two fresh cases of bubonic plague were reported in Kobe. The patients are men residing at Kaigan-dori, Nichome.

A telegram from Osaka, under date of Dec. 3rd, says that two fresh cases of plague have appeared in South Horii-cho. Both proved fatal.

An Osaka telegram dated Dec. 4th says that the latest cases of bubonic plague number three. Ninety more sanitary officials have been appointed.

A telegram from the Hyogo Kencho reports that three fresh cases have been reported in Kobe, the patients being two men and one woman. The woman has died.

With regard to a report that cargo from Kobe and Osaka had been buried on arrival in American waters, the following official telegrams have been received at the Foreign Office:—

Mr. Uyeno, Japanese Consul in San Francisco.—No cargo from Kobe was burned, but cargo from that port was removed to the disinfecting stations if it carried no certificate from the medical officers of the American consulate at Kobe.

Mr. Saito, Consul at Honolulu.—No cargo from Kobe was burned on account of the prevalence of plague there. Oranges which were recently imported from Japan were not permitted to be landed as the fruit was found to be rotting.

Mr. Hisamidz, Consul at Seattle.—The report that the cargo from Japan has been denied landing is baseless. It is permitted to land after undergoing disinfecting measures.

Mr. Morikawa, Consul at Vancouver.—The authorities of the Vancouver Harbour Office have not taken any special step with regard to cargo from Kobe.

Mr. Aihara, Consul at Portland.—No Japanese cargo was rejected and there is no special arrangement as to goods from Kobe.

The Osaka City Assembly has decided to expend yen 107,900 in enforcing sanitary measures.

A fresh case of plague appeared in Osaka on Dec. 5th. The patient is a man residing in south Horii-cho. He is reported to have died after having been removed to hospital. Since the first appearance in October there have been fifty-five cases in all.

Three fresh cases of plague were reported on Dec. 6th in South Horii-cho, Dotonbori and Kitsukawa-machi, Osaka. Some living rats infected with contagious germs were found the same day in the South urban district.

ST. ANDREW'S BALL.

The ball given in Yokohama on Thursday evening in honour of St. Andrew, Scotia's patron saint, must be written down as one of the most successful and enjoyable functions of its kind ever held here. There was a very large gathering "of fair women and brave men," and the presence of many kilted representatives of "Caledonia stern and wild" among the male dancers lent an air of distinction and vivid colour sadly lacking in most public functions in Yokohama. Several debutantes made their opening bow on the occasion, and the ladies' dresses in the great majority of cases were very handsome. The decorations, which were strongly Scottish in character, were greatly admired, the newly furnished Hall with its pale primrose walls and unobtrusive gilding showing to great advantage. The Committee were:—Mr. A. J. McClure, President; Mr. R. B. McKinnell, Vice President; Messrs. T. C. Anderson, E. Coutts, H. C. Gulland, F. O. Stuart, H. V. Summers, W. B. White, Secretary; C. A. Fraser, Treasurer.

Supper was served before midnight, the "haggis"—the noble work of Mrs. J. Leslie Robertson—being borne in with all the honours, the music of the pipes being supplied by Mr. Argyle Robertson, late of the London Scottish. The President, Mr. A. J. McClure, submitted the only toast of the evening—"The pious memory of St. Andrew"—which was received most loyally. During the evening the Sword Dance was given by the Messrs. Robertson, one dancing, the other playing the pipes; though the slipperiness of the floor must have been a handicap: a heather-clad heath is the proper place for such a display. The music for the reels, by the way, was played by Mrs. Skrimshire, Miss H. Page and Mr. C. H. Thorn. The programme was as follows:—

MARCH.	SUPPER—EXTRAS.
1. Highland Schottische	9. Two Step
2. Waltz	10. Waltz
3. Caledonians	11. Eightsome
4. Two Step	12. Waltz
5. Waltz	13. Lancers
6. Two Step	14. Two Step
7. Waltz	15. Waltz
8. Reel

"Auld Lang Syne."

THANKFULNESS.

"And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good."

Oh pleasant world, where every day the sun
Lights up with beauty cities, hills, and streams
And makes creation praise God unaware
And man goes forth to labour with a smile.

Oh wondrous world, where every night the sky
Is rich with Heaven's high miracle of stars,
Until the godless feel that God is near
And children dream of angels in their sleep.

Oh mystic world, where every month the moon
Climbs up the blue and golden steps of Heaven, Filling the earth with gentle light which finds
The hidden beauty in all common things.

Oh joyous world where every year the Spring
Delights the heart of man with new-born life
And leads him back to Eden, peace and love,
While glad earth fills her lap with smiling flowers.

Oh noble world, so full of noble acts
And gentle deeds and little kindnesses,
Wrought in the dark when no one sees but God—
Who would not say 'tis well to be alive?

ARRIVAL OF THE "LYRA."

The anxiety which had been aroused with reference to the steamer Lyra, overdue from Seattle, was allayed by the arrival of the vessel in harbour on Saturday morning. The Lyra, which is under the command of Captain G. V. Williams, and is of 3,516 tons, left the American port on Nov. 3rd and her slow passage across the Pacific was caused by an almost unbroken series of adverse gales. From the 3rd to the 26th these conditions lasted unceasingly and indeed she may be said to have experienced only three days' favourable weather. She arrived on the Japanese coast with sadly depleted bunkers on Friday, making Inuboye about 10 a.m. and anchoring outside the forts for the night.

Some of the seas that visited her were mountainous and there were accidents among the officers and crew but happily none of a serious character. The situation was complicated at one time by an accident to her steering gear which, however, was promptly remedied.

The Lyra is consigned to Messrs. Dodwell & Co., Ltd.

The Argentine Republic has decided to establish a legation in Akashi-cho, Tsukiji, Tokyo. The construction will commence in February, next.

revenue to be devoted to meeting these outlays, we have the following:—

Ordinary Revenue from taxation, etc.	235,058,994
Revenue from War Taxes, Sales, etc.	173,358,005
Excess of War Department Revenue	3,145,711
Surplus from year 1905-6	36,500,000
Proceeds of Foreign Loan lying in London	150,000,000
To be raised by Domestic Loans	438,541,165

Grand Total of Revenue..... 1,036,603,875

Several points call for comment in the above. The first is that the War Taxes (160 million yen), which ought to cease to be levied at the end of 1906, are to be continued throughout the whole year. The second point is that there are no new taxes or monopolies, the only additional burden under this head being some changes of tariff rates. The third point is that apparently the domestic debt is to be increased by 438½ million yen. As to this, however, note has to be taken of the fact that 200 millions of the outstanding 6-per-cent. loan are to be redeemed with one-half of the proceeds of the last foreign loan (50 millions sterling, actually producing 44 millions). Hence the Government will have merely to substitute 5-per-cent. bonds for those bearing 6 per cent., and the Treasury will retain 220 millions of the foreign loan against the required 438½. Further, 150 millions out of the Extraordinary War Expenditures (Table X) are to be paid out in the form of rewards and gratuities to officers and men. This money need not be actually obtained by means of a loan. The greater part of it can be handed to its recipients in the form of bonds. Thus 370 millions out of the 438½ are accounted for, and there remain only 68½ to be obtained. But it is expected that a sum of about 50 millions will be received from Russia for the maintenance of the prisoners, so that, on the whole, the demand made on the domestic money market will probably not exceed 20 or 30 millions.

Yet another fact to be noted is the destination of this sum of 438½ millions, namely:—

Yen.
To be devoted to withdrawal of Troops	210,000,000
To be devoted to Rewards and Gratuities	150,000,000
To be devoted to new Undertakings	66,541,000
To be devoted to Railways, Telephones and the War Foundry	12,000,000
Total	438,541,000

Still further analysis of the above figures must be made in order to arrive at a clear idea of the outlays constituting a sequel of the War, apart from the cost of bringing back the army and the sum devoted to rewards and gratuities. These outlays are:—

Yen.
XI.—Special Post-bellum Outlays.
Foreign Department	1,730,616
Home	109,399
Finance	110,161,354
Military and Naval	86,765,879
Justice	68,895
Education	473,740
Agriculture and Commerce	5,471,387
Communications	4,869,535
Sanitary Expenditures	2,804,559
Total	212,455,364

The particulars of the various outlays are as follow:—

XII.—Foreign Department.
Building of Police station attached to Legation in Korea	6,422
Residency-General and Residencies in Korea	1,180,000
Expenses of Establishing Residency-General	394,194
Building of Consulates	150,000
Total	1,730,616

XIII.—Finance Department.
Service of the War Debt	110,000,000
Expenses of Financial Representative abroad	100,000
Expenses of National Debts Consolidation Bureau	50,000
Expenses of Tariff Investigations	11,354
Total	110,161,354

XIV.—Military and Naval Departments.
Cost of organizing 4 new Divisions	10,000,000
Cost of troops in Manchuria & Korea	20,000,000
Military Restorations	25,000,000
Increase of Naval Outlays	4,398,178
Expenditures at Port Arthur, &c.	2,203,361
Naval Restorations	25,000,000
Expenses of plant for coal-mining	164,340
Total	86,765,879

XV.—Other Outlays.
Horse-breeding Establishment	720,000
Yokohama Customs reclamation, &c.	1,000,000
Yokohama Break-water	290,000
Kobe Customs, &c.	419,407
Development of Plant for making materials	359,278
Cattle-breeding Stations	99,872
Expenses of Chemical Analysis in the field of manufacture, &c.	60,169
Places for Mechanical drying of Figured Matting	35,000
Steel Factory	1,828,813
Telegraphs and Telephones	2,420,000
Posts and Telegraphs in Manchuria, Korea and Saghalien	2,385,170

It is seen from the above that a sum of 110 million yen is to be appropriated annually for the service of the debts contracted on account of the War. This means that the debts will be paid off in 30 years. As for the debt which existed before the war, 36 millions annually are devoted to its service. The latter payment has always been provided out of the ordinary revenue, but the former constitutes a new charge which must be met by a new source of revenue. The War taxes which produce 160 millions exceed the sum required for the service of the War debts by 50 millions.

THE BISHOP OF HONGKONG ON THE YELLOW PERIL.

THE Bishop of Hongkong, speaking at Norwich to a meeting of the Church Missionary Society, is reported to have expressed the opinion that the Yellow Peril is a very real affair. He did not say that he expected any armed hordes from Eastern Asia to pour over Europe after the manner of the Goths and Huns. The peril in his opinion is that when China awakes, as she is now rapidly doing, and when she has learned by Japanese instruction the means of asserting herself, she and Japan alike will sternly refuse to allow their territories to be over-run by foreigners who exclude from their own lands Chinese and Japanese subjects. In a word, unless the anti-Chinese and anti-Japanese legislation of the United States and of Australia be repealed, all Americans and Australians will be driven out of China and Japan. That forecast presents some curious phases when one considers it practically.

Is it conceivable, for example, that Japan should drive out all the Anglo-Saxons living and trading within her territories? The term "Anglo-Saxons" may be objected to as over-comprehensive, but that is what it comes to in practice. For there is no conceivable method of discriminating between Australians and other sections of the British race. To exclude the Australians effectually it would be necessary to exclude all men and women of British origin. Again, it is not possible to discriminate between the communities of the Pacific Slope who are chiefly responsible for the restrictive legislation, and the communities of other parts of America who do not share this prejudice. The door must be shut in the face of all or all must be admitted. Imagination is not incapable of some lofty flights but that it can reach to the conception of Japan "sporting the oak" to Anglo-Saxons and continuing to extend her hospitality to all other nationals, is not credible. And this leads us at once to China. Japan is pledged, solemnly pledged, to unite with England in maintaining the policy of the open door in China; that is to say, in keeping China accessible to the trade, residence and travel of all outside nations equally. Yet Bishop HOARE finds it possible to imagine Japan combining with China to expel British subjects and American citizens from the Middle Kingdom. We can not share the Bishop's credulity. The Yellow Peril, as he sees it, is invisible to us. But then the question presents itself, are the Japanese and the Chinese powerless to exact for themselves from Australia and from the United States the same liberal treatment that both the Asiatic empires extend to Australians and Americans? Is there nothing to fear in the way of retaliation? They are not powerless and there is emphatically something to fear. China has answered these questions. Her boycott of American goods was a weapon which, if resolutely enforced, would soon hurt America beyond endurance. And although it is to us inconceivable that Japan should ever essay the extreme measure apprehended by Bishop HOARE, it is quite within the range of possibility that when she recovers her tariff autonomy, not many years hence, she may impose prohibitive rates on all goods coming from countries which exclude her subjects. Thus retaliation is always feasible, though not perhaps exactly in kind. Bishop HOARE thinks that it would be regrettable if Canada or Australia were over-run by the yellow race. He wants to see a white Canada and a white Australia. Opinions may differ as to the expediency of such views being publicly enunciated by a prominent divine of the Christian Church. We do not, for our own part, see any valid reason against a man expressing his views whatever be his station or occupation. But there can be no second opinion that men like Bishop HOARE climb to the very acme of inconsistency when to the Chinese and Japanese they preach the principle of universal brotherhood, as taught by the creed they profess, and to their own countrymen they advocate the doctrine of exclusiveness. To this day the average foreigner smugly imagines that he has preferred a damning indictment against any Oriental race when he applies to it the epithet "anti-foreign," yet it does not apparently cause him the slightest quail of conscience that his own country should be emphatically and legislatively anti-Oriental. For the rest, we can not see that the practical experiments thus far made warrant this scare of "swamping." Singapore and Hongkong open their doors freely to Chinese, yet the British element there has not been swamped and is in no seeming danger of being swamped.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

The inactivity of the Seiyūkai during the past few months has been a surprise to many. Dr. Tomizu furnishes an explanation of the general political situation in Japan to-day which, whether it is correct or not, deserves consideration. According to two articles which appear in the November Taiyō over his signature, the Seiyūkai as an efficient political organization has begun to fall to pieces. Here is the gist of his observations on this subject:—Of all the political parties of the Meiji era the Seiyūkai has in many respects been the greatest. Its present head is a man of extraordinary talent and in its ranks are to be found a large number of our leading politicians. How is it then that in a crisis like the present its influence is so little felt? The difficulty with our political parties in the past has been insubordination to their heads. But the trouble now seems to be a blind acquiescence on the part of members in the decisions of their chief. Thus have we gone from one extreme to another. It is said that for reasons best known to himself Marquis Saionji decided some time back not to oppose the action of the Government in the peace negotiations and that he enjoined silence on such leading members of his party as were residing in the capital. This veto on public criticism of the Treaty of Peace does not seem to have had much effect on the action of provincial Seiyūkai leaders; for opposition meetings have been held in various places. Thus we see that the Seiyūkai is divided against itself and shows signs of dissolution. The situation might be saved by prompt action against the present Government by Marquis Saionji. That the whole country is opposed to the conditions of peace needs no demonstration. If the leader of the Seiyūkai aims at voicing public opinion he should encourage instead of repressing opposition to the Cabinet. For whether the members of the Seiyūkai speak out or not, dissatisfaction with the terms of peace is felt so strongly that in the next General Election voting will be much affected by the attitude candidates take in reference to this question. There are some who say that prominent members of the Seiyūkai have been bought in by the Government. But this we do not credit. The time has passed for wholesale bribery. If this were suspected the constituencies would take the matter up warmly and refuse to return the bribed members, and where would the Seiyūkai be then? In our opinion there is at present no wholesale bribery going on, because there are a very large number of members of the party who are above accepting bribes. But the split in the party is quite manifest. It will reveal itself still more plainly when the Diet opens. Nothing will induce certain members of the party to refrain from expressing their unqualified disapproval of the action of the present Government during the peace negotiations.

Dr. Soyeda Juichi, writing in the Taiyō on "Points requiring attention in the Introduction of Foreign Capital," says the introduction of foreign capital is usually urged on two grounds.

(1) It is said that in order to ensure financial prosperity to the country the Government must undertake a great many huge post-bellum enterprises that need more capital than can be found in the country. (2) It is affirmed that with the object of gaining the confidence of foreigners and inducing them to take part in business undertakings under the Japanese flag we must obtain money from them. Dr. Soyeda seems to be of opinion that there is a serious danger of overdoing the borrowing from foreigners just at present. He says that there will be a number of speculators in the field, who for personal ends will endeavour to obtain loans from foreigners. He is in favour of the use of foreign capital, but thinks that many abuses will have to be guarded against.

* * *

Commenting on Baron Komura's return to Japan, Mr. Toyabe Shuntei remarks that it was one of the saddest spectacles that has been witnessed during the last eventful 18 months. No flags were put out in his honour* no banzai greeted him when he landed. Carefully guarded by police he made his way to the capital. In order to win international fame for his fellow-countrymen for humanity and generosity he was prepared to set at naught their patriotism. Though the accredited plenipotentiary of a victorious country, he never assumed the attitude of a victor and ended by concluding a peace which has given universal dissatisfaction to the nation whom he represented. Baron Komura from the very commencement of the negotiations which led to the war maintained that what Japan chiefly wanted was the exclusive right to control Korea and the entire evacuation of Manchuria by Russia. Japanese victories having secured these two objects, such questions as obtaining an indemnity from Russia, the possession of the interned ships and the retention of whole of the conquered island of Saghalien occupied in the Baron's mind a very subordinate position. De Witte perceived from the outset by the manner in which the demands for money and other concessions were put forward by Komura that his heart was not set on them. Though no doubt thoroughly conversant with the feelings of the whole nation in reference to suitable conditions of peace, Baron Komura was convinced in his own mind that the best policy for him to pursue was to utterly ignore public sentiment and win for Japan lasting fame for generosity.† As a statesman who had for many years past advocated the necessity of Japan's fighting for her rights in Korea and in Manchuria, and in order to turn back the wave of Russian aggression, if negotiation failed to accomplish this purpose, Baron Komura felt so satisfied with the result of the war as to be indifferent to all minor considerations. Even De Witte, as he showed when interviewed by a Paris reporter, was conscious that the stopping of Russia's Far Eastern aggression and forcing her to greater European activity can only be regarded as leading her back to the right road. So that this war has brought as much benefit to Russia as to Japan. The Russian policy which led to the war having been entirely reversed, in Komura's mind the great object of the gigantic struggle was obtained, and so in such minor affairs as the cession of a portion of Saghalien or the obtaining of money or other things, Japan could afford to be generous.

In an article on the New Anglo-Japanese Alliance Viscount Watanabe draws attention to the manner in which certain Japanese publicists

* We have been informed that not only were they not put out, but in some cases flags that had been hoisted in connection with festivities were deliberately lowered before Baron Komura arrived.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

† It appears to us that in this and other articles which we have read on the subject too much responsibility for the conditions of peace is given to Baron Komura. The general opinion among Japanese seems to be that he only acted as a mouthpiece of the Cabinet and the whole responsibility really lay with one or two of the elder statesmen whose advice the Cabinet took at the time. But there are people who say that His Majesty the Emperor urged the necessity of making peace in a stronger way than was adopted by any members of the Cabinet or the Privy Council.—(WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

have misinterpreted the references to England's defence of India, supposing that Japan has taken upon herself the responsibility of assisting England to defend the Indian frontier and pointing out how much that might involve. It may be taken for granted that the two High Contracting Parties will only act together when the action of one of the Parties is insufficient for the maintenance of the rights alluded to in the Treaty. Articles III and IV should be read together. Because in Art. III Great Britain expresses herself as recognizing "the right of Japan to take such measures of guidance, control, and protection in Korea as she may deem proper and necessary to safeguard and advance those interests," we are not to suppose that England will need to send troops to help Japan to guard her rights in Korea. In Art. IV there is nothing said about Japan's sending troops to assist England to guard the Indian frontier. The text must read:—Japan recognizes her (England's) right to take such measures in the proximity of that frontier as she may find necessary for safeguarding her Indian possessions.* Though, continues Viscount Watanabe, Japan does to a certain extent share the responsibility of defending the Indian frontier with England, that does not imply the obligation on Japan's part to send troops to India to assist in that defence. (Shikaredomo Shinkyōyaku ni oite wa Indo kokkyō (國境) no anzen ni kwan shite sekinin wo wakatsu koto to naritara demo, kanaradazu shimo Indo shuppei (出兵) no koto wo kitei shitaru ni arazu.)

Dr. S. Nakamura contributes to the Taiyō a well written essay criticizing adversely the Treaty of Peace. None of the articles of this Treaty are satisfactory in the conception of this jurist. Art. II., referring to Korea, he deems quite superfluous, as Japan was already actually exercising the rights she asked Russia to recognize. Dr. Nakamura objects to Art. XV., which provides that in case of discrepancy in the interpretation of the Treaty, the French text and not the English, shall prevail. This was an undesirable concession to make in the face of the decision given against Japan at the Hague Court of Arbitration, says Dr. Nakamura, where the argument turned on the interpretation to be given to a foreign language. To Dr. Nakamura the Treaty appears to be a one-sided affair. Japan after gaining victory after victory in the field was defeated in diplomacy all along the line.

Mr. Takenokoshi, M.P., in an article of great interest covering no less than 10 closely printed pages of the Taiyō, argues in favour of an entente between Japan and France. We are of opinion that much that Mr. Takenokoshi says deserves the attention of the Japanese people; for it is no secret to those who have resided long in this country that compared with her attitude to England, the United States and Germany the treatment France has received from Japan has been markedly cold in recent years. The beautiful French language and French literature have been comparatively neglected and the many fine traits of French character are but imperfectly understood and appreciated in this country. The role that France has played in Europe in politics, in science, in philosophy, in art and above all in belles-lettres, is inadequately realized by the majority of Japanese scholars, notwithstanding much that Mr. Takenokoshi says to the contrary. Such essays as that of Mr. Takenokoshi are most timely at the present juncture when once again Japan finds the coast clear for establishing closer relations with a people whose habits, manners and general character so much resemble her own. We subjoin an epitome of the first part of Mr. Takenokoshi's article, reserving the remainder for our next Summary:—It is now a long time since a Russian observed that the Japanese language was the French of the East and since an Englishman

* This point was much discussed in London at the time of the publication of the Treaty, most of the papers rightly ridiculing the notion that England is unequal to the task of defending her empire against foreign attack; though of course some of the Liberal organs in their unpatriotic fashion tried to make out that this eventually was contemplated by the Balfour Government when they drew up the Treaty. said that in their desire for novelty the Japanese were like the French. These affinities between the French and the Japanese are superficial compared with others which have struck close observers of the two nations. The history of France and the history of Japan resemble each other in some very striking particulars.* (1) Modern France and Modern Japan owe everything to a Revolution. Though that of France was marked by tumult and bloodshed and that of Japan was comparatively peaceful, in both cases the nation was wholly transformed by the revolution. In Japan institutions which had a history of some 2,500 years were swept away in a few months. Feudalism gave place to popular government. The nation adopted a new ideal. To make European civilization their own was the one desire of the whole people. Anything and everything done in the name of civilisation was popular. For the sake of it men would suffer any amount of hardship or privation. This watchword "civilization," acted like a spell whenever it was used. Much was done in the name of civilisation here in Japan that resembled what was perpetrated in France in the name of liberty and equality. There were assassinations and what not here as well as there. But in both cases a new nation was created. (2) No sooner had France and Japan begun to live a new life than they found themselves the object of envy and hatred in foreign countries. The French revolution, in addition to causing endless disturbances in every country in Europe, led to a great European war. Had European States sympathized with the new movement in France much bloodshed would have been avoided, but France's new ideals were not appreciated and France was considered to be a danger to the whole of Europe.* Our new civilisation brought us at first, some 10 years ago, into conflict with China. It was China's antipathy to our new civilization that led to that war. And when we came to inquire what rendered us successful in the two big wars in which the rôle we have decided to play has involved us, we reply, it was principally the new civilization that we have adopted. France's success on the battlefields of Europe was largely owing to the fact that her soldiers were conscious that they were fighting for ideals which were superior to those of their foes. (France hokumin wa kakumei teki shisô wo meihaku ni shikinin shite tatakatte. Sono seishin teki no genin ga shôri no genin de atta de aru to omou.) These men had breathed the breath of a new national life. They were conscious that they constituted the State called France. Our success in the war which is just over was largely owing to the same political causes as those that worked such wonders in France. While the nobility stood between the people and their sovereign in this country, it was impossible to awaken powerful national enthusiasm for any cause. The people in feudal times could not realize that they had any national rights. In their conception even the Emperor belonged to the barons who alone had access to him. Along with the granting of popular rights there has come to us as to the French at the end of the eighteenth century patriotism such as was never known before. The existence of this patriotism was the first cause of our success in the wars. The other causes were our knowledge of European tactics, the scientific training which our experts have received in all those branches of knowledge that may be used for military purposes and the education which our soldiers have enjoyed. Of our educational progress we perhaps have reason to be proud. Take the knowledge of European languages. I think it would be no exaggeration to say that there are 1,500,000 people in this country who know some foreign language. There is now no high Government officer to be found who cannot read and understand at least one foreign language. Those holding office in political parties, and the leading men in banks and business houses of all kinds all know some European language. Among the 370 members of the

* Mr. Takenokoshi seems to us to have rather overstated his case here, to have left out of consideration the personal ambition and unscrupulousness of Napoleon I. and his envy of the greatness of rival Powers, and to have omitted to take into consideration the fearful excesses that marked the reign of terror in 1792. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

House of Representatives 120 understand some foreign language. These men are able to read and understand foreign newspapers and magazines. The yearly progress now being made is so rapid that 10 years hence it is not improbable that there will be five million people in Japan who know some foreign tongue. Among our soldiers it is perhaps safe to say that there are not more than two or three in a hundred who are unable to write a letter. Though Japan is a very old state the Japanese of the Meiji era are a new people. There comes a time in the history of nations when all the units composing them renew their youth as it were by becoming permeated with new ideas. So was it with the French after the revolution; so was it with the Germans when the Prussian states were amalgamated into one great Empire; so was it with the Americans when they fought for their independence. So has it been with modern Japan. It was the strength of Japan's new life that carried her through this war, aided by the training her scholars and sailors had received. In the theory that the Bushidô explains everything connected with our victories we have no faith. The Bushidô is to us mere poetry (Bushidô wa Nihon ni oiteba hitotsu oo waza ni suginai; nanra no chikara no aru mono de nai.)

(3) When we come to ask how much real sympathy there is between France and Japan at the present time, and how much is there that they have in common, the answer is a great deal. We must bear in mind that on the side of France during the past few years owing to her alliance with Russia the public expression of sympathy for Japan has been impossible. But on one side we find by inquiry that there are quite a number of politicians who earnestly desire to see France and Japan either allied to each other or united in some other kind of close relationship. Japan owes much to France. (a) The whole world has been trying to discover the reasons for our great success in this war and as far as land battles are concerned it is said that our German training was the cause of our efficiency. But is the military science that our generals have learnt distinctly German at all? We believe not. The system now followed by us was first originated by the French and afterwards adopted by the Germans and modified to suit their special requirements and circumstances. The original ideas and principles that form the basis of the present German system were all evolved by the French.* A large number of our veteran generals have studied the French system and as for our artillery officers even the youngest of them have been trained according to the French system. (b) At the very centre of our new civilisation is our Code of Law. This code, as is well known, is based on the French Code and the compilers of our new laws were mostly men who had studied in France or received a French education here†. And these new laws of ours are gradually changing all our customs and ways. (c) In fine art it is true to say that the tastes of our upper classes are distinctly French. (d) Our Government administration is wholly French. The French system of administration has been pronounced by competent judges to be almost perfect. It was largely evolved out of the brain of perhaps the most wonderful organizer the world has known, the great Napoleon. Other things in modern Japan have changed, but our executive is as distinctly French to-day as it was when first introduced. (Gyôsei soshiki dake wa gômatsu no henkwa naku rippa ni sonzai shite aru.)

(e) In literature and various handicrafts Japan may be said to be a dependency of France. Goncourt was one of the first Europeans who drew attention to the special merits of our art. His writings on art attracted much attention here. Coming to literature, the novels of Dumas, father and son, have been read in this country with as much pleasure as the works of Bakin. If Victor

Hugo be regarded as the originator of the romantic school of novelists in France, he was no less so in Tokyo, where he has had many imitators. Though the plays of Racine and Corneille are only studied by a very few Japanese, the writings of such authors as Balzac are known to a large number of Japanese readers, and as for Thiers and Gambetta, they have as many admirers here as they have in France. (4) Since we owe so much to France and are closely connected with her in so many ways, it should be but natural were the two countries to draw nearer to each other politically. It is interesting to observe that 31 years ago* a proposal came from France that the two countries should unite their forces against China. This was in connection with a disturbance in Formosa that occurred at that time. This being the first offer of alliance that Japan had received from a European Power it made a deep impression on her. It showed that French statesmen were sharp enough to see our capabilities. But our Government did not respond to the invitation of the French, for the simple reason that the nation was then in an unfledged state and in no condition to attempt the lofty flights contemplated by its would-be ally. But the Japan nation have never forgotten what the making of this offer implied and Japanese sentiment towards France even during the recent war was immensely affected by this apparently small episode in history. It is my opinion that had any other Power but France afforded to Russia so much assistance as France did, Japan would have attacked that Power, but Japan was restrained all through the crisis by the feeling that France was not a real enemy of this country, though her acts might wear an ugly aspect. Japan had not forgotten the proposal for an alliance.

 In an article published in the Shin-kōron (新公論) entitled "Centres of Activity in Self-Government in the Provinces," Mr. Takashima Heizaburō says:—In studying the laws of progress throughout the world it is observable that improvements of every kind largely depend on the nature and efficiency of certain centres of activity. It is said that in this country in normal times everything centres in politics. How far this is true we are not prepared to say. The interest which people take in local affairs is usually much more keen than that taken in central Government administration. The instruction and enlightenment of a whole nation can only be successfully carried out by the creation of powerful local centres of activity. These are very much needed in Japan to-day. In our opinion all great provincial educating agencies should be connected with state schools. They should be made the centres of general enlightenment. In most villages the Primary School teachers are in the ideas which they entertain far ahead of the people among whom they reside. The prosperity of the country largely depends on the establishment of a superior system of self-government in every village and town. Effective and enlightened local government depends largely on the advance of knowledge among the mass of the people. We are in favour of making our Shōgakkō the centres of every kind of beneficent influence. We must begin by securing thoroughly good men as school teachers. Then establish village libraries to be managed by these teachers; museums, public gardens and places of recreation, social clubs, lecturing and the like should be all utilized. These things cannot all be done in a hurry, but they should be begun at once and be effected by degrees.

 Count Itagaki contributes an article to the Shinkōron on "Preparations for a Constitution in China." He first gives it as his opinion that Japan's intercourse with China will largely depend on the ability of her Minister at Peking and he goes on to say that Japan should appoint the very best man she has to that post. He thinks that far more importance is attached to the choice of a man for this position than to the choice of a Cabinet Minister. We want a military man who is also well versed in civil affairs for this post. If the peace of the Far East is to be maintained for any length of time Japan and China must consult each other as to the military preparations that it is necessary to make in order to be ready for certain contingencies. Of all the post-bellum schemes that have been discussed this is the most urgent. Before China can be governed constitutionally there are certain preliminary measures that must be undertaken. One of these is universal conscription; another the building of double line railways throughout the 18 provinces of China. The latter is especially called for from a military point of view. Another very urgent measure is the education of the lower orders. Constitutional Government can only be made to work smoothly when the mass of the people have sufficient knowledge to enable them to understand national questions. In China at present there is no such thing as national self-consciousness. Education must be made universal. At present the forces that oppose the will of the Central Government are so formidable that no reform inaugurated at Peking makes rapid progress in the provinces. The number of guilds and associations that have for their object the defeat of Government projects in China is enormous, specially in Southern China. These all tend to split the people up into factions and to hinder the development of popular Government. There are some people who seem to despair of seeing China governed constitutionally. But it appears to me that the difficulties we had to overcome here were far more formidable than those which confront the Chinese to-day. We had a powerful, proud military class to deal with—men who despised money and the people engaged in making it, who spurned the notion that farmers, traders and mechanics had any right to have a voice in Government affairs, who regarded the people who formed the bulk of the nation as too inferior to be counted. This remnant of feudalism was one of the most formidable of obstacles to Constitutional Government, and its effects are felt by politicians to-day. In successful popular Government the business man, the military man, and the professional man are all on an equality. In China there is no class system such as we had here; no sets of people worshipping quite different ideals. The Chinese merchant is as conscious of the necessity of honesty in business as the most highly educated Chinese gentleman. In China the ordinary business men is on a higher moral level than are our ordinary Japanese business men. With such conditions as exist now in China if the inhabitants of the various provinces were once brought into close communication with each other and if the benefits of constitutioned government were once impressed on the minds of the leading business men in the country, the whole nation would become constitutional from purely utilitarian motives. I am of opinion that the establishment of constitutional government in China would involve fewer difficulties than we encountered and are encountering, and that the results of the change would be more substantial than any we have seen here.* This deduction of mine is based on the character and ways of thinking of the Chinese people.

* * * The latest number of the Tōyō Keisai Zasshi has an article from the pen of the editor, Mr. Amano Tameyuki, entitled Cromer Shiki ka Hastings Shiki ka (The Ways of Cromer? or of Hastings?) The gist of it is this that the Japanese Government will have to decide at once whether they are going to govern Korea as Warren Hastings governed India in the interests of the East India Company, or as Lord Cromer is governing Egypt in the interests of the Egyptians. The Tōyō Keisai Zasshi points out how Japan's policy in Korea has failed all along owing to its intense opportunism. The Government has never been able to make up its mind what it could do or what it was desirable to do. Has it come to a decision even now? Mr. Amano has his doubts on this point. England's old way of governing her colonies was to make their interests subservient to that of the home country. This policy resulted in the loss of America. Her present method is to make the permanent welfare of the peoples governed the primary object of her rule. The Koreans have a deep-seated notion that Japan is putting her own interests before theirs. It will take a good deal to convince them that the opposite is the case. But it is the plain duty of the Japanese Government to adopt the disinterested, high-souled policy of Great Britain and administer affairs in such a way that the Koreans shall receive far more benefits from the new rule than such of her own nationals as are settled in the peninsula. This policy pays best in the long run. Its adoption by England has gone far to diminish the envy of other nations when new territory has come into her hands.* Japan's action in Korea will be keenly watched by rival Powers and also by her ally.

Writing on the expense of getting the troops back from Manchuria the Tōyō Keisai Zasshi says:—Everybody seems to think that it will cost three or four hundred million yen to bring our armies back, but our calculations don't amount to anything like such a figure. Supposing that there are 800,000 men to be brought back, an estimate that is probably not far wrong, and supposing that each man cost, with his horse, 150 yen, the total cost would be one hundred and twenty million yen. It is said that the high estimate of three or four hundred million yen had its origin with a remark made by a Government officer. The subject will doubtless come up for discussion in the next session of the Diet.

The tax on imported rice is entirely condemned by the Tōyō Keisai Zasshi. This tax was originally imposed as a war tax and its removal was talked about for some little time. But now its continued imposition is urged on the ground that it is necessary for the protection of rice growing in this country. The protective policy of which it forms a part is defended on the ground that it is necessary for every country to grow its own food or be reduced to starvation in time of war—an absurd theory, as food stuffs are not contraband in time of war.† Even in the case of contraband goods belligerents can get hold of them in most cases by employing neutral countries as media of transport. China obtained a large quantity of coal, which is semi-contraband, from Japan during the China-Japan war. This policy of the government is of the short-sighted and pottering kind. To commence to protect rice-growing now in this manner is quite unnecessary and inconsistent. If all other Japanese industries such as tea and silk-growing are to be so protected, it would be another thing. Rice growing in this country needs no protection. It has not in the past been badly affected by the import of foreign rice. The amount that has been annually imported has depended on each year's home crop, ranging between about fifty million yen and ten million yen. Taking on an average of from 5 to 10 years the value of the rice imported figures out at about thirty million yen per year. A tax of 15 per cent. on this only brings in a sum of 4,500,000 yen while it raises the price of rice to such an extent that the whole country, including every trade and every industry, suffers thereby. While the whole nation is groaning under other forms of taxation

* If the speech delivered by Marquis Iiō on the 27th ult. to the Japanese residents of Seoul and Chemulpo may be taken as an exposition of the policy the Government intends adopting then Mr. Amano's apprehensions are unwarranted. It will depend largely on the Resident chosen.—WRITER OF SUMMARY.

† Even if they were, food would find its way to this country in time of war as it did in Europe when France and England were at war, when, despite Napoleon's strict orders to the contrary, England imported from France no less than 1,600,000 quarters of wheat. There is of course no such thing as national independence as regards trade, and protectionist arguments founded on this theory are rotten.—(WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.)

the Government by this stupid policy prevents the poor man from obtaining cheap food. Even as a war tax the tax was economically indefensible; its continuance in time of peace cannot be too strongly condemned.

THE BALLOON PERFORMANCE.

Capt. Price was very fortunate in having almost perfect weather for the inflation of his balloon—on Saturday afternoon and for the sensational exhibition that he subsequently gave to an admiring populace. A considerable number of foreigners, of both sexes, were admitted to the cricket ground by ticket, and there was an influx of Japanese which at merely a nominal sum per head should have yielded the adventurous performer a respectable reward in the aggregate if they had all paid. The weather was pleasant and there was hardly any breeze. The inflation of the balloon was accomplished according to schedule and promptly at 4 p.m., the huge chocolate-coloured affair being then well distended. Capt. Price gave the order to let go and, in a moment, the balloon with the parachute attached beneath and the aeronaut swinging under that, soared upwards, the ascent being most graceful and effective. Once away from the shelter of the Pavilion the balloon was affected by a westerly wind which, though light, carried it swiftly over the former settlement and at length, after scattering a number of advertising sheets Capt. Price gradually opened his parachute and began to descend. Varying currents of air prevailed at the different heights but the aeronaut came down with great steadiness, alighting in the harbour some twenty yards off the French Hatoba, where he was immediately taken into a sampan and, soaked to the skin as he was, hurried back in jinrikisha to demonstrate his safety and to receive the congratulations of the spectators. The balloon, freed from the weight of man and parachute, capsized, and the heated air with which it had been inflated by means of a kind of field oven escaped in the form of black smoke, the empty fabric descending near the Grand Hotel. It was a highly successful performance and strikingly displayed Capt. Price's great presence of mind, courage and skill.

RUGBY FOOTBALL.

"BORN IN JAPAN VERSUS THE WORLD."

The annual match between "The World" and "Born in Japan" took place on Saturday and proved exceedingly interesting, the latter winning by a goal to nothing with the narrow margin of five minutes from the call of time. The teams were:

"BORN IN JAPAN." (Colours)		"THE WORLD." (Whites.)
W. B. Mason	Back	J. T. Dixon
K. van R. Smith		L. D. Tebb
H. W. Kilby	3/4 Backs	J. S. Cartwright
D. Weed		B. C. Foster
L. Stornebrink		G. K. Totton
J. E. Moss	3/4 Backs	H. E. Hayward
T. W. Kilby		B. C. Lambert
W. S. Moss (Capt.)		W. B. White (Capt.)
A. Kingdon	Forwards	F. O. Stuart
O. Strome		A. Hills
W. J. White		A. E. Cooper
A. W. S. Austen		C. von Fallot
E. J. Moss Jr.		W. E. J. Detmold
W. H. Worden		R. C. Bowden
W. Graham		A. R. W. Landon

Whites kicked off and the play at once became active, both teams being remarkably equal, for though Whites were heavier their opponents were the turn faster. In the first half, Weed, Moss, Van Smith, Mason, and H. W. Kilby distinguished themselves specially for the Colours and Von Fallot, Cartwright, Totton and Tebb for the Whites. When the whistle went play was in the Colours' twenty-five.

Tom Kilby was able to get the ball away for Colours when the second half opened but very shortly Totton took it to the other end of the field. Some very lively work followed, play going up and down the field with advantage latterly on the side of the Colours and finally Van Smith was able to pass the ball to Stornebrink, who scored a try and made the goal easily. Dr. Moon, R.N., was referee.

UNION CHURCH BAZAAR.

It sounds rather banal and commonplace to say that the Union Church Bazaar held in the Public Hall on Saturday afternoon and evening was a success. Yet banal and commonplace though it be that is the truth, and the whole truth, regarding one of the best organized church socials held in Yokohama for a long time. The ladies of the congregation and their friends who have spent lavishly of their time and talents during the past few weeks must feel amply rewarded for all their trouble and we shall be surprised if the Treasurer does not report a very substantial addition to the Church Building Fund. The Hall looked very pretty, many of the heavier decorations put up for St. Andrew's Ball being allowed to remain, and these with the gaily decorated stalls, booths and rustic arbours made a scene which drew forth commendatory remarks from every visitor. Business began even before the Bazaar had been officially declared open by Mr. Huntingdon Wilson, the American Chargé d'Affaires, and was conducted so briskly that few things remained unsold when the closing hour drew near. It was therefore found unnecessary to call in the "auctioneer" who usually furnishes the concluding item of a Yokohama bazaar. This in itself speaks well for the admirable selection of goods offered at the stalls.

Mr. Huntingdon Wilson, in opening the Bazaar, said:—I feel highly complimented in having been asked by the Committee to open this bazaar. Never having opened a bazaar I have not the slightest idea whether I shall be able to perform this pleasant duty properly. The invitation reached me suddenly yesterday afternoon, and I confess I was rather bewildered. I wondered what one did when one opened a bazaar; whether bazaars were shut very tight, and if so, whether I should come armed with some cunningly devised key or prepared to batter down the doors. These first ideas which crossed my mind were quite mistaken. Like most vague things I find my duty ends in talk. Now I think that only "money talks," properly, at a bazaar; so I shall say very little. I am glad I brought no implements to pry open the bazaar with. I arrive here and find it already wide open. It only remains for me to ask you all to open wide your hearts and your purses for the benefit of the worthy object which brings us together here to-day. First I must congratulate the ladies, who have with such industry and taste prepared so many beautiful things for our entertainment and delectation. It is more blessed to give than to receive, but to give and to receive, as we are going to do to-day, must be most delightful of all. There is such a treat in store for us that I feel very unkind in detaining you. Mr. Booth, Mr. Loomis, Mr. Bennett and the other gentleman who carry on the Union Church in Yokohama are certainly to be congratulated. They have done their work so well that they have made everyone sincerely anxious to further it by building a new church. How anxious may be gathered from the enormous amount of work that has been done to prepare this splendid bazaar. ("Hear, hear.") And, indeed, it is a worthy object, the building of a new Union Church. All who watch church work abroad must regret the variegated front of different denominations which Christianity presents in the missionary field. My observation is that Christians of all sects in the missionary field realize this disadvantage and try to minimize their differences. I always think that the Union Church here and the one in Tokyo, where so many Christians of different shades meet together in brotherhood and sisterhood, are splendid examples of what can be done in that direction. (Applause.) Every fortune can stand one bazaar in a life time. So now, ladies and gentlemen, let us proceed to impoverish ourselves, looking forward to the future when a fine new Union Church building shall rise upon the ruins of our fortunes which we shall have the pleasure of wrecking to-day. (Laughter, and Applause.) Ladies and gentlemen, the bazaar is now open.

The Ladies who organized the Bazaar were under the direction of a general committee consisting of Mrs. John Henry Loomis (President), Mrs. E. H. Manley and Mrs. E. H. Smith. The reception committee was composed of Mrs. Scidmore, Mrs. D. H. Blake, Mrs. E. H. Smith, Mrs. Nichols, and Miss Crosby. The stallholders were:—

Crochet and Knitted Work:—Mrs. Van Petten, assisted by the Misses Lewis and Slater.
Fancy Stall:—Mrs. W. Kirkland Wilson and Mrs. J. Strauss.
Stationery, etc.:—Mrs. J. H. Loomis.
Turnt Leather and Poker Work:—Miss Loomis and Miss Tracey.

These ranged from the grave—"After the Battle"—to the gay—"Cream of Wheat;" from the tragic—"You dirty boy!"—to the comic—"Bliss"—and were hugely enjoyed. Mrs. MacBeth organized these; Mde. Henckler posed "the figgers;" and Miss Elsie Blundell played the appropriate music.

THE LAW COURTS.

RAZA v. CHARTERED BANK.

The hearing of an action filed by Mr. M. A. Raza against the Chartered Bank, petitioning for the delivery of forty bales of tanned sheep skins, each bale containing a thousand pieces, was resumed on Dec. 2nd in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Matsuda. Plaintiff was represented by Mr. Ideura, and the defendant bank by Mr. Nakamura.

Mr. Akai, of the Yokohama Specie Bank, was examined as an expert witness as to the practice in vogue among the banks in such cases as the present.

Witness said that he did not know the practice in vogue among foreign Banks; but as far as the business practices of the Specie Bank were concerned, bills of lading and other shipping documents attached to a draft, should be handed over to the consignee when the amount specified on the draft was paid. The bank, however, sometimes delivered the documents to the consignee before the draft was honoured on a special understanding between the parties. Even if a draft was not paid by the consignee, the goods could not be allowed to lie in the compound of the Customs. In this case the bank asked a landing agent to pass the goods through the Customs and to store them in warehouses at the expense of the consignee.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ideura, Plaintiff's Counsel, witness said that though the landing agent had charge of the goods on behalf of the bank, the latter recognised no responsibility for damage incurred. In the case of the draft being dishonoured, the shipping documents and the goods would be returned to the shipper at the latter's expense. Witness, further stated that the Yokohama Specie Bank had no business connection with Messrs. Helm Brothers, so that he could not say anything about their methods of conducting business. He, however, was aware that Messrs. Helm Brothers were well-known landing agents doing considerable business.

Plaintiff's Counsel applied for the re-examination of Mr. Carl Helm, who was summoned at a previous hearing. Counsel wished to know the details of the negotiations between Messrs. Helm Bros. and the ship's owner or agent with regard to damage done to the tanned skins in dispute.

Mr. Nakamura opposed the application, stating that this was unnecessary, as Mr. Helm had given a detailed statement at the previous hearing.

Application was also made to call a representative of the local branch of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank to give evidence as to the practice in vogue among foreign banks in such cases.

The Court consented to both applications and the hearing was adjourned to Dec. 21st.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

In connexion with the Tokyo disturbances Dr. H. Kimata and Asa Fujii, a nurse of the Meiji Hospital, and two lawyers, Mr. C. Maruyama and Y. Ishiyama, were examined in the Tokyo District Court on Dec. 3rd as witnesses. On the following day, Mr. Y. Arai, a lawyer was examined by Preliminary Trial Judge Nakagawa also as a witness.

On Dec. 4th, Dr. J. Yamada, residing in Hatago-cho, Kanda, Tokyo, was arrested and removed to the Tokyo Jail. Subsequently his dwelling was searched by Judge Takemura and Public Procurator Miura.

The accused in this case number 326 in all. Nine have been released on bail with deposit and 123 without deposit.

ALLEGED MURDER CASE.

The preliminary examination of Soe Noguchi, younger sister of the late well-known poet, N. Noguchi, and her husband, who are charged on suspicion of having murdered the poet by giving him poison, has concluded in the Tokyo District Court before Judge Ishii. The decision will be given within a few days.

CLAIM FOR SHIP DAMAGE.

A case in which Messrs. Andrews and George, No. 242, Yokohama, claim yen 315 against Messrs. Dodwell and Co., No. 50, came up again on Dec. 7th in the Yokohama District Court before Judge Matsuyama.

Referring to the bill of lading connected with the goods in question, plaintiff's Counsel stated that the clauses should not be held to cover the dispute in the present case. The damage to one drilling machine brought by the Den of Crombie had been caused by negligence on the part of the ship. This was regarded by the Japanese law as fuho-koi, or unjust action. Responsibility as to defective management should be borne by the defendant firm, which represented, as agents in Yokohama, the ship's owner.

Defendants' Counsel asked plaintiff's Counsel to give a definition of an unjust action and said that the present case arose from damage which defendants admitted without hesitation. Consequently the essential question was whether they had a right or obligation to be sued in a legal action under Japanese law; it was not a dispute as to mismanagement by the ship.

Plaintiffs' Counsel held that unjust management was only the cause of the damage. No further explanation was needed. Counsel produced two letters and said that one of them was a certificate given by the captain of the steamer acknowledging the damage done to the machine and addressed to Messrs. Dodwell and Co. Another was a notice from the firm to plaintiffs with regard to the damage to which intimation the certificate of the captain was attached.

Defendants' Counsel, Dr. Masujima, stated that he could not give an opinion on the evidence unless he made further enquiry of his clients. For this purpose he asked the Court to adjourn the hearing.

At this stage the plaintiffs' Counsel asked the Court for leave to summon an expert in order to ascertain the following items:—(1) according to British shipping laws, the ship's owner and his agents in foreign countries are bound to bear any damage caused by negligence on the part of the ship, and the agents accordingly are authorised to combat claims; and (2) though the goods are bulky, they must be packed, with the exception of coal or bar-iron, in accordance with the custom of the trade.

Defendant's Counsel said that (1) there was no necessity to examine an expert witness as to the shipping laws of Great Britain, since the cause of the plaintiff's petition is attributed to alleged defective treatment, although this negligence is still an open question; (2) the cargo in dispute was not packed as prescribed, which fact was clear.

Repeating his request for summoning an expert witness as to the British shipping laws, plaintiffs' Counsel stated that the cause of the damage and the responsibility to be borne by the ship's owner and his agents should be defined. Otherwise, the dispute could not be determined. Counsel further asked the Court for leave to examine Captain Rennie Tipple, No. 50, as a witness and said that this gentleman was a Lloyd's surveyor and attended to the examination of damaged goods.

The Court, after short consultation, decided to summon an expert and said that the witness will be appointed by the Court. The Court, however, did not give a decision as to the request of the plaintiff's Counsel to examine Capt. Tipple.

The hearing was adjourned without fixing the date for the next sitting.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JAPANESE CHARACTER.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—One may form an estimate of Japanese character without a thorough knowledge of the language just as one may form an estimate of the French character without knowing French. A Chinaman living in the Chinese settlement in San Francisco might even form an estimate of the American people without knowing a word of English. An estimate, however that ventured into such deep waters as "individuality" and moral traits of the higher order should, one would think, require a thorough knowledge of the language and life of the people gained through living with them and speaking with them in their native tongue.

With regard to this latter there are few Westerners in Japan who can express themselves intimately in Japanese. There are more Japanese who can express themselves with approximate intimacy in English; but those who are able to do so have about without exception been abroad; and have therefore become more or less Westernized. In a word, they are not really representative Japanese. Even in the case of the former, when he speaks to an Englishman he is at a disadvantage. In the first place he is on a foreign platform so to speak, and before a foreign audience. You may rest calmly on the firm foundation of your "strong individuality." You decline to "adapt yourself." The consequence is that as a rule the Japanese whether from a sense of politeness, which may differ from ours—or from a certain psychic sympathy—will probably adapt himself to you. Thus at the outset you occupy the strong position. Mahomet has had to come to the mountain, and the mountain consequently feels a certain sense of superiority.

The circumstances being such, if you are given to probing deeply into human nature, you are not unlikely to come to the conclusion that there is something lacking in the soul of the other party. You can go as deep as he can, and yet there are depths in you that he cannot fathom. You have a certain something that the other man lacks, and which you can hardly define. You may speak of it vaguely as "a strong individuality"! A something "Noble"—a je ne sais quoi. This "flattering unction" that a man lays to his soul is one of delusions, as well as one of the consolations, of human nature the world over.

Suppose, however, that the positions are reversed. Suppose you attempt to express yourself in Japanese to a Japanese. The only way to realize the difficulty is to try it. The writer has done so, and so far the result has been utterly unsatisfactory.

In the first place one cannot speak with perfect assurance, there is always something more or less apologetic. The words seem to come from the head and not from the heart. One has to search one's brain for the phrase that would just express one's thought or one's feeling, and frequently one has to give up a point or appear to agree with the other man simply from a lack of the power to verbally discriminate. In short, one feels that one is not expressing one's self, but another and a more or less artificial self that one could not care to be judged by.

It is therefore very difficult for Westerners and Japanese to get much below the surface at the best of times. And the surface appearance of things is singularly deceptive in Japan. If, however, one wishes to really understand the ideals, the emotions and the thoughts of the Japanese there is no other way than to live among them and to speak with them in their mother tongue, just as a Japanese who wishes to understand Englishmen, must live in England and speak with us in our mother tongue.

If after all this one still feels that one is on a higher moral level than the people one is living among the higher something will find abundant occupation, and will no doubt be duly appreciated, if it is the real thing.

Yours respectfully,

A MAN IN THE STREET.

MISS HOLLAND'S FACTORY GIRLS' FUND.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I wish the kind subscribers to the Cotton Factory Girls Fund to know, that during the past 18 months, they have been the means of giving delight to many thousands of girls and children employees. Allow me in their name to warmly thank them and those friends, who have either sent pictures and cards, or who have spent time and trouble on their behalf. As there are some misapprehensions in Yokohama as to what this special fund is for, I beg to state the line indicated in the Japan Mail has been closely adhered to, excepting in the case of the Matsuyama Institute Building Fund, for which I first asked the special permission of donors. I understand that with the Fund we are to make the lot of the factory girls as happy as we can, whether in buying paraphernalia to entertain all generally, or in buying gifts to give pleasure to them individually in the boarding houses and hospitals.

I would remark that in the former, all receive the same value to avoid disappointing any; whilst in the latter when compatible the gift differs with the wants of the individual.

If friends approve, the Fund for the future will be called by the distinctive name of the Philanthropic Fund for the Japanese Cotton Factory Girls.

There are 25,000 girls working in the factories we have to do with.

I wish to give them all a pleasant surprise this winter by procuring a cinematograph of Japanese manufacture which is comparatively moderate in price. Yet I find that the apparatus and a few picture films, even with charity discount would more than swallow up the balance now in hand of the special fund. Therefore I hope to have the cooperation of sympathisers. The cost with a few films at first to take round to all the factories, would not be less than yen 350. I need not say we should be very grateful for the gift or loan of second-hand films, of lantern slides either instructive or amusing. Off fresh pictures we are in special need.

I wish the foreign little girls in Japan would each dress one doll for a tired little factory girl whose working hours are from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., one week and from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., the next week.

In reading the accompanying sheet of expenditure, it may be difficult to credit that such cheap books could be entertaining, and so I would explain that if I had had to buy the same number of books at the original price with the same rate of discount the cost of these books alone would have been 772 yen. This series was chosen not because grown up people thought them suitable for children's reading, which I consider quite an inadequate test, but because the children were the judges, and they are in favour of them now to the extent of buying at an average 10,000 monthly in Tokyo alone. Children never read sermons, and certainly never go to shops to buy them. By the Editor's kindness a cheap edition of this popular series was brought out, and I cannot exaggerate the boon they have been. The books are pretty, the print large for their tired eyes, and the language so easy that they can thoroughly enjoy the stories; which leave in their minds happy thoughts and bright ideals, enabling them to work more cheerfully,

The teachers often have told me, that kanzashi and cakes are not so much appreciated as these books, which, with the cards and pictures, are their loved little possessions; so much is this the case that now and again I hear of some dying child requesting the factory nurse that she be not buried without them, as she would feel so lonely; which facts demonstrate pathetically the consolation the books and cards have been to them.

Commending the need to the generosity of your readers, I remain, yours truly

J. M. HOLLAND.

N.B.—Mrs. Townend, of Negishi, Yokohama, Miss Lloyd Thomas and the Misses Merriman, Yokohama, will gladly receive contributions, toys, cards, books, etc., towards this fund.

A CHALLENGE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL")

Sir,—In your paper of Dec. 1st a writer makes the statement that nowhere in the world has he seen such "Cynical carelessness of the virtue of women servants as in foreign and especially in Missionary households in Japan," and goes on to say that "servants rooms receive both sexes indiscriminately." That is a very serious charge to make; and as he says "especially the missionaries," I wish, in the interests of morality and fair play, he would be more explicit.

That they are all so criminally negligent, I know surely is not true; that any are, I doubt. If he will name one in Yokohama, I will undertake to see that the abuse is corrected.

Yours respectfully,

A YOKOHAMA MISSIONARY.

BISHOP AWDRY AND JAPANESE CHARACTER.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL")

Sir,—Of course I claim no special wisdom or authority, nor an acquaintance with the Japanese at all comparable to that of the writer of your article; but if I may ask him to reconsider more carefully the actual statements in my letter to the English Times, I hope he may see that he has misunderstood me.

I did not say (nor do I think) that the Japanese are specially immoral or untruthful or dishonest or lacking in nobility or changeable in their national characteristics, but that the presence of other virtues, which in an Englishman would imply also a high degree of purity or truthfulness or honesty, does not necessarily imply the same in a Japanese; and this on account of a difference in the blend of qualities between Japanese national character and English national character, of which Englishman who do not know the East are not likely to be aware.

I did, in fact, endeavour to guard very carefully against the idea that the Japanese nation in general is dishonest.

But the misunderstanding which has most surprised me is that by which I am supposed to imply that the Japanese readily change their national characteristics. Why the very meaning of half my letter was that they do not so change, though on account of their accurate observation, adaptability, and courtesy, Englishmen may very possibly have a mistaken belief that they do so, and in some cases, as in that of marriage of English girls to Japanese men, the results of such a mistake may be deplorable.

Are accurate observation, adaptability, and courtesy, bad characteristics? Or is the opposite tendency of falling in grudgingly, if at all, with the customs of countries which travellers visit a trait which the writer would wish the Japanese to imitate?

But I was not instituting any comparison of better or worse between Japanese and English character; and only asserted that to infer from the presence of certain observed magnificent qualities that certain other qualities will be correspondingly present, though not within the range of observation, is in a high degree precarious; and that for this reason the almost hysterical admiration in England at this moment for everything Japanese might lead presently to disagreeable or even dangerous consequences.

Let me thank the writer for at least giving me credit for good intentions, and for his kindly expressions.

WILLIAM AWDRY.

"THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—Various reports having from time to time appeared in your columns relative to the alleged irregularities of American Insurance Companies, I have much pleasure in asking you to publish the following statement furnished by the Head Office of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States giving the result of the critical investigation made into the financial status of the Society by two well-known firms of chartered accountants, Messrs. Price, Waterhouse & Co. of London and Messrs. Haskins and Sells of New York:—

"Chartered accountants certified to directors Nov. 29th, that assets as claimed were all found on hand and amounted September 30th, to 416 millions. Surplus 67 millions. Reduction caused by conservative revaluation real estate certain stock and in no way reduces Society's income.

"Chartered accountants further certified Society's financial condition as disclosed by examination thoroughly sound and satisfactory."

This authoritative statement should serve to dispel any anxiety entertained by policyholders in regard to the position of the Equitable.

It is also most satisfactory to me to be able to announce that the new business of the Society for October shows a handsome increase over that for September. This was in New York, the home of the Society.

Yours faithfully,

J. T. HAMILTON,
General Manager.

THE DOSHISHA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—The statement in the Summary of the Japanese Religious Press, on page 609 of the Japan Weekly Mail of Dec. 2nd that at the recent meeting of the General Conference of the Kumiai-kyokai "objection was taken to the present superintendent (Riji) of the Doshisha Divinity Hall and the Conference decided that it was undesirable for the Kumiai-kyokai, to retain its connection with this officer" is liable to mislead your readers. There was no objection made or felt to "the superintendent of the Divinity Hall," whoever he may be; what was felt was that it was useless to continue negotiations which had been under way for two years between the Conference and the Trustees (Riji) of the Doshisha as to forming a plan for admitting representatives of the Conference to a share in the administration of the Theological Department of the Doshisha, without their becoming members of the Board of Trustees.

I am happy to be able to add that, as the result of negotiations since then some of the leading men of the Conference are about to be added to the Board of Trustees, and thus much the desired co-operation of the Kumiai Chuchus with the school will be accomplished.

Yours truly,

December 2nd, 1905.

KYOTO.

THE CRITICISM OF BISHOP AWDRY'S LETTER.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—It is not my intention to enter upon the vexed question of Japanese morals, though I cannot forbear expressing regret that for some time past the Japan Mail has devoted so much space to painting the moral condition of England and America in colors somewhat darker than some of us think it deserves. The paper is read by so many Japanese that its assertions and frequent insinuations must do much to lower the esteem in which Englishmen and Americans are held, and they also lessen the desire of the Japanese to correct unsatisfactory conditions in their own land. If they are constantly assured that they are in all respects equal and in most respects superior to others, one powerful incentive to reform is taken away. It is, indeed no excuse for evil-doing to say that other people are no better; but men are too often satisfied in this way, and to many readers it seems as though this were getting to be the Japan Mail's constant answer to even just criticisms of the Japanese.

Leaving aside questions of comparative morality, I beg leave to speak of one remark in your recent editorial concerning Bishop Awdry's letter to The Times, since it has only an indirect relation to ethics but is of interest to students of Japanese customs. You say: "So far as a woman is concerned we have never heard that the mother-in-law problem constitutes a greater trouble in Japan than it does in any European country. Indeed it scarcely enters the field of practical questions at all, for married men, except when they are muko-yoshi, seldom live with their parents."

On reading this I rubbed my eyes with astonishment. Though it behooves me to be modest in expressing an opinion, since I have not yet "passed more than four times" nine years among the Japanese, I thought I had heard more every year about the troublesome mother-in-law (of the wife) than I ever heard in America, and also had personal knowledge of many cases where the bride went to live with her husband's parents. Live and learn, however; and if my impressions upon the matter are wrong, I ought to be thankful to have them corrected. Others seem to have fallen into the same mistake. Prof. Chamberlain says: "The mother-in-law, with us a terror to the man, is not only a terror but a daily and hourly cross to the girl—for in nine cases out of ten, the girl has to live with her husband's family." ("Things Japanese," 1st ed. p. 224.) Omitting quotations that might be made from Miss Bacon and other foreign writers upon the Japanese family, I turn to Japanese testimony.

Kaibara's "Onna Daigaku," which was long the standard authority upon woman's duties and still has great influence, is full of directions to young brides upon the necessity of obeying parents-in-law. The following quotation will serve as a specimen: "On every point must she inquire of her father-in-law and mother-in-law, and abandon herself to their direction. Even if thy father-in-law and mother-in-law be pleased to hate and vilify thee, be not angry with them, and murmur not." (Chamberlain's translation.)

Mr. Fukuzawa Yukichi wrote a sharp criticism of the "Onna Daigaku," and also published the "Shin Onna Daigaku" in which he wrote: "It is not uncommon for the wife and mother-in-law to come into collision; and even when there is not open collision, it may be said to be almost generally true in all families throughout Japan that the two cherish feelings in their hearts that prevent them from being on pleasant terms with one another." ("Shutome to yome to no aida ni shotoku no okoru wa mesurashikarazu; taiji aruwa hyomen ni shotoku sezaruru mo, naishin atagai ni fukumu tokoro arite uchitokasaru wa Nikonkoku-chu no maika hotondo futsu to in mo kanari.) He proposes as one remedy that the young married pair do not live under the same roof with the parents, but if this cannot be avoided, that there be at least separate kitchens ("kamado wo betsu ni suru").

Tamura in "The Japanese Bride" says among other things: "It is an unknown custom to us that when a son is married he will leave his father's home and make his own home along with his bride. Our bride and groom live under the same roof with the groom's father and mother." "Generally, the mother-in-law in Japan is very strict and troublesome to the bride." (pp. 65 and 68.) In Japanese novels the mother-in-law often appears as a disagreeable personage. Readers of "Namiko," the English version of one of Tokutomi's novels, will recall an instance of this. "Ichijiku," a prize novel that had a wide circulation four or five years ago, turns on the situation that Bishop Awdry had in mind, for it describes the difficulty that an American girl who married a Japanese had in pleasing his parents.

Only the day after reading the article in the Mail I heard a Japanese in addressing the pupils of a girls' school give the advice as to how they might in future days get on peaceably with "mesurashiki shuto-shutome." Has not the phrase a familiar sound? Is it felt necessary in England and America to give school girls advice of this kind?

Yours respectfully,

OTIS CARY.

JAPANESE MORALITY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I do not wish to take part in the discussion of Japanese morality, for I do not now feel that I am yet competent to pass judgement upon it in any final way. I would merely venture the statement that a missionary from the nature of his work would be apt to learn more at first hand of Japanese life and character in two years than most any other foreigner would in ten years. Take, for instance, the question of marriage and divorce. A defender of Japanese morality might quote the divorce laws of Japan and say that, whatever the past has been, to-day Japan is on a level with other civilized nations. But in one year's experience a missionary runs up against the common practice of a man and wife living together without legal marriage and exciting no comment or disgrace thereby; and that laws of divorce do not apply to such marriages. In my own first year's experience I had to sift to the bottom and try to settle several intricate cases of peculiarly Japanese immorality. In less than one year two cases came to my personal attention of a father sending his daughter to two and three different men in succession as a trial wife. On the other hand cases of beautiful family devotion and virtue came to my attention. I do not mean by this to judge Japanese morality either way. I simply wish to point out that a missionary, and especially an evangelistic missionary in the interior, is able naturally to come to a quicker and more practical judgment of Japanese moral life than are other foreigners living in Japan.

I myself have lived in Japan but three years. But during that time, excepting for a few months in Tokyo, I have lived in interior cities, in Japanese houses, surrounded closely on all sides by Japanese people. I have travelled about thousands of miles by train, rickshaw, basha and boat, stopping always in Japanese style in Japanese hotels and private homes. I have built two buildings and had charge of numerous repair jobs. I have rented houses and paid rents. I have been in Japanese houses in times of sickness and death. I have had the older missionaries, both men and women, come back from their long trips out in the smaller places among Japanese homes and tell their experiences. And all this intimate intercourse and business dealing has been with genuine Japanese people, hundreds of miles from the treaty ports. Would not three years of such life in Japan enable a missionary to learn more about Japanese life and characteristics than would ten years of an ordinary foreigner's life?

But all this is not the purpose of my letter. I wish to protest against the indictment of missionary households in the editorial on Morality in Japan in your last Friday's issue. Your correspondent seems to make the charge that the Japanese disregard of what we think of as the proprieties in the relation of the sexes is due to the "cynical carelessness in foreign, and especially in missionary households in Japan." I never remember reading a more absurd charge. One of the most striking and universal features of Japanese life is the almost complete disregard of those restrictions which we deem so necessary in the relationship between the sexes. And this feature is all the more common the farther you get away from foreign households. I am not arguing whether this feature of Japanese life tends to a greater immorality or to a greater morality. I simply point out the absurdity of your correspondent's charging a national peculiarity to the carelessness of foreign households.

I cannot defend other foreign households from a lack of experience in them. But I do know that your correspondent's indictment of missionary households is unjust. I have been in missionary homes from Kagoshima and Nagasaki almost up to the Hokkaido, and I have found missionaries to be almost finicky in their concern for the moral welfare of their servants. They hedge them about with restraints that seem senseless to the servants. And they are not careless of their physical welfare either. The servants' quarters in the missionary homes are comfortable Japanese rooms.

Here is a case in point. One spring we added to our own household a maid servant. She was not of the ordinary class of servants, but the wife of an educated professional Japanese. On account of a yakamashii mother-in-law and the drinking habits of her husband she was compelled to leave her home and enter service. She is a finely-natured modest young woman. The servant quarters of our own house being occupied by a simple man servant, as a matter of course I provided a room for her in a neighbouring house. When I left for the summer I gave strict orders that she should live in the neighbouring house during my absence. But when I returned, I found that because it was more convenient she had lived all summer in our own servant quarters with only the shoji partitions. I have no idea that there was any immoral relationship between the two. They simply followed the practice of their nation.

You say that the foreigner who complains of the defects and untrustworthiness of Japanese servants is always one who gives no concern to his own servants' moral and creature welfare. That is not true. I, myself, so far have found Japanese servants to be honest and trustworthy and therefore I have always defended them. But my many friends, who do not agree with me, are not careless and unconcerned about the welfare of their servants. The one woman servant whom I have known to fall away into an immoral life did so, in spite of the safeguards put around her, through the direct connivance of her own family.

But if there are foreign households in Japan who are cynically careless of the moral and physical welfare of their servants, they, together with those like them in other lands, fall under the condemnation of our Lord—"It is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into the sea." But I think it is untrue and unjust to lay this at the door "specially of missionary households in Japan."

As I have referred to a particular Japanese woman, who might be identified, I must beg simply to sign myself

RUSSIA IN REVOLT.

London, December 1.

The St. Petersburg newspaper Slovo publishes a report that there was a big battle lasting two hours and a half at Sevastopol on Tuesday (Nov. 28). The warships, in possession of mutinous crews in sympathy with the rebels, opened fire on the forts, which replied hotly. After a furious bombardment, the cruiser Achakoff was pierced by a shell and burst into flames; the cruiser Dnieper and another vessel, besides some torpedo craft, were sunk by the guns of the forts. The commander of the rebel force, Lieut. Schodt, was mortally wounded, whereupon the mutinous squadron surrendered to the authorities. By this time, about half of Sevastopol city had been demolished.

It is reported that a naval mutiny of grave importance is in progress at Libau and that there is reason to fear another at Kronstadt.

London, December 2.

The St. Petersburg Review publishes an article declaring that the line of action now adopted by the Government must be regarded as simply a suicidal policy, "playing right into the hands of the revolutionaries."

Financial and business circles are agast at the further heavy drop in Bourse rates at St. Petersburg and Moscow yesterday.

It is openly declared that the course of events must be directed in some other way or the days of the present régime are numbered.

Later.

It is reported that the mutineers at Sevastopol have gained the upper hand.

London, November 6.

A union of unions is playing an important rôle in Russia, exercising the widest control of the revolutionary movement. It intends demanding that Count Witte should convoke a constituent assembly.

London, December 2.

Martial law has been abolished throughout Poland.

London, December 3.

A number of officers of the Guards have been arrested at Tsarskoe Selo.

The anticipation of a coup d'état is increasing.

It is rumoured in St. Petersburg that one of the Grand Dukes participated in the plot against the Tsar.

There are some indications of a conspiracy amongst the officers of the Guards, but it is impossible to say whether any of the Grand Dukes participate. The officials, however, admit the reports of grave occurrences at Tsarskoe Selo.

St. Petersburg is swarming with Cossacks. It is understood that the whole of the Cossack forces throughout the Empire have been mobilised.

London, December 4.

Telegraphic communication with St. Petersburg has been completely interrupted. The situation in Russia is being reflected on the Paris Bourse, where a heavy drop in Russian securities has taken place, leading to general weakness.

France holds five hundred millions sterling of Russian stock and anxiety is already expressed about the payment of coupons.

Later.

The Jews in Odessa have succeeded in sending a message to the frontier imploring all civilised nations to prevent an unparalleled catastrophe, the troops being invited to exterminate the Jews.

London, December 5.

The most elaborate precautions are being taken in St. Petersburg in view of an apprehended outbreak of the troops. The crews of warships have been disarmed owing to their evident sympathy with the revolution. Quickfiring are trained upon the barracks of the Horse Guards. All who can are leaving the country. Finance and commerce are paralysed. The engine-drivers of expresses bring Reuter's St. Petersburg news twice daily to the German frontier, whence it is telegraphed. The impending railway strike threatens to cut off this means of communication.

London, December 6.

Further heavy falls in Russian bonds caused a collapse on the Paris Bourse yesterday, starting a panic.

In St. Petersburg on Sunday the feeling on the whole was more confident. People are getting used to the situation. All the troops in the vicinity have been called in. The run on the savings banks continues in St. Petersburg.

MR. MORGAN GOES TO CUBA.

London, December 1.

Mr. Morgan, the American Minister to Korea, has been transferred to Havana, in succession to Mr. Squires, whose hostile attitude is resented by the Cubans.

THE INSURANCE SCANDALS.

The investigating committee has issued an address to the holders of insurance policies throughout America advising them to retain their policies in spite of the revelations. The Committee says that legislation will be introduced to safeguard their rights.

Mr. McCurdy, the President of the New York Mutual Life Insurance Society, has resigned.

PRINCE ARTHUR OF CONNAUGHT.

London, December 2.

Prince Arthur of Connaught and his mission will reach Yokohama in a man-of-war, arriving early in March.

BRITISH DECORATIONS FOR TOGO AND OYAMA.

It is said that the high distinction of the Order of Merit will be conferred by King Edward on Admiral Togo and Field-Marshal Marquis Oyama.

THE BRITISH CABINET.

At a meeting of the British Cabinet held yesterday it is believed that the Ministers decided on resigning without dissolving Parliament.

London, December 3.

It is understood that Mr. Balfour will see the King early next week. The Radical newspapers now intimate that Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman is prepared to accept office if the King desires.

London, December 5.

The British Government has resigned.

London, December 6.

The international fleet has occupied the island of Lemnos.

Later.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, before going to Buckingham Palace to kiss hands on taking office, conversed with the Duke of Devonshire.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)
LEGATIONS WITHDRAWING FROM SEOUL.

It has been already stated that the United States Government had given official notice of the withdrawal of its Legation from Seoul. A similar notice has now been given by Great Britain, who will replace her Minister by a Consul-General.

While threatening the occupants for money, two of the employees rushed out, and informed the police at the box near by. When two policemen, T. Obata and another, approached the house, the men rushed out and one of them assaulted constable Obata, who was in advance inflicting a severe injury on his face. Both robbers effected their escape, but a little before noon the same day, one was arrested in the Kumagai restaurant, Isezaki-cho, by Mr. Kominato and four other detectives of the Isezaki-cho Station. The other man was soon after arrested near the Gonzo Bridge, Bandai-cho. The men are Y. Takana (27) and S. Yamamoto (32), gardeners, living at Uyeno-machi Kitagacho. On Friday morning, they were removed to the Yokohama District Court.

THE NEGOTIATIONS IN KOREA.

Through its editor, we presume, who has special access to Marquis Ito, the Chuo Shimpo has obtained a somewhat detailed account of the course of the recent negotiations in Seoul. The policy of the Koreans is said to have been pretty much what might have been expected in the circumstances. They clearly foresaw what was coming; they recognised its inevitability and they knew that they were powerless to avert it. But they determined to procrastinate if possible, trusting to the saving chances of time and events. So they began by adopting towards Marquis Ito a policy familiar to Oriental diplomatists as it is to Occidental, the policy of "reverential ostracism." From the moment of his arrival in Chemulpo he was treated with such an extreme degree of politeness and deference that he found himself virtually isolated from all free intercourse with Korean statesmen. Of course that was only a very temporary expedient. The Koreans knew well that it must soon cease to be effectual, and when that time came their device was to play off the Throne against the Cabinet and the Cabinet against the Throne. If Marquis Ito applied to the Emperor the latter was to refer him to the Cabinet, and if he applied to the Cabinet, he was to be told that in such a grave matter the Ministry could not move without instructions from the Sovereign. Wearing out by this fruitless buffeting from pillar to post, the Japanese, it was hoped, would at last resort to forceful methods, and then an appeal might successfully be made to onlooking nations. Marquis Ito detected this programme from the first, and took his measures accordingly. On the 15th of November he repaired to the Palace, determined to obtain the Emperor's mandate as an essential preliminary. His Majesty attempted at the start to refer the Ambassador to the Ministry, but Marquis Ito objected that the point at issue presented no basis for long discussion, and was nevertheless of such importance as to demand the Emperor's attention from the outset. His Excellency then entered into a long review of the conditions existing in the East and of the circumstances which rendered it essential that Japan should assume the control of Korea's foreign affairs. The Emperor objected that even when Korea had been a "feudatory" (hansoke) of the Middle Kingdom, she had nevertheless retained the direction of her own foreign relations. Marquis Ito replied that Korea's foreign relations had existed at that time in name only. She was not yet confronted by any of the complications which subsequently arose and which constituted a menace for neighbouring States as well as for herself. Besides, the true significance of the protection she then received from China had been illustrated when a Chinese Viceroy directed the landing of thirty thousand troops upon her shores. Was it then intended, the Emperor asked, that Korea should occupy towards Japan the position held by Hungary towards Austria. Marquis Ito emphatically answered in the negative, and denied with equal assurance that the relation was to resemble that between Sweden and Norway, or that Japan contemplated assuming in the East a place resembling the hegemony held by Prussia in the union of German States. Korea was to have the management of her own domestic affairs. In that field she was to be autonomous. Then the Emperor asked whether the Legations in Seoul and the Korean Ministers abroad could not be suffered to remain in name at all events, although their functions were transferred to Japan. Naturally Marquis Ito declared such an arrangement to be wholly impractical and certain to lead to grave complications. He also took the opportunity of explaining that one reform quite essential to Korea's well-being was the separation of the Throne from the administration and a clear differentiation of the functions of each. An effect of such a reform would be to give unprecedented stability to the Imperial Court. Now for the first time the Emperor showed signs of acquiescence, and he finally agreed to issue the mandate required by the Ambassador. These things are easily set down in the rough, but the conference which thus resulted was an affair of fully 4 hours' duration and must have greatly taxed Marquis Ito's powers of persuasion and argument. Nothing now remained, apparently, except the discussion and conclusion of a convention embodying the arrangement already endorsed by the Emperor. That duty was entrusted to Mr. Hayashi, and he met the Foreign Minister, Pak Che-soon, on the 16th, the other members of the Cabinet assembling at the same time to discuss the matter. It appears from the Chuo's account that there was truth in the references made in previous telegrams as to the invincible reluctance of any of the Ministers to take the lead in signifying assent. Marquis Ito had to intervene and to repeat all the arguments addressed on the previous day to the Emperor. The Prime Minister, who was naturally the proper person to take the lead, attempted to excuse himself on the plea of ignorance, inexperience and incompetence. But Marquis Ito pointed out that while these things might have been valid reasons for declining to accept office originally, they could not be pleaded as justifications for refusing to discharge the duties of office after it had been accepted. The Minister, quite unable to traverse Marquis Ito's arguments, finally broke down and shed tears. But neither he nor his colleagues were able to urge anything in contradiction of the Ambassador's exposition of the situation. Still the same reluctance to openly signify agreement kept all lips sealed, and nothing remained except for Marquis Ito to put a direct question and to announce that silence on the part of the Ministers would be taken as signifying their assent. Such a plan suited their mood thoroughly, for they seem to have fully appreciated the inevitable nature of the occasion though they could not persuade themselves to openly recognise it. Nothing is related by the Chuo as to Marquis Ito's procedure at the Palace on the 17th. The narrative closes with the 16th.

KOREA.

Friday, December 8.

Prince Li Chai-wan has been appointed Special Ambassador to Japan for the purpose of conveying Korea's acknowledgements of Marquis Ito's visit.

It is reported that there are signs of disturbance between the Christians and the literati in Pyong-yang, but as the Japanese gendarmes are on the alert nothing serious is likely to occur.

Mr. Pak Che-soon has been attacked, it is said, by catarrh of the stomach and has entered hospital where he is likely to remain for some six weeks. That is one account. But another is that he was fired at by a sergeant with a pistol—a sergeant in what army we do not know—and that, when complaining to the Japanese Legation of the occurrence, he was seized with vertigo and had to be placed under medical charge.

The Jiji Shimpō's Seoul correspondent says that although on the surface of things order seems to have been restored, there is a strong under-current of discontent, and signs are apparent that an outbreak, more or less serious, may occur at any moment, not in the capital alone but also in the provinces.

A sergeant of the Korean army committed suicide in front of the Imperial Palace on the 5th instant to mark his dissatisfaction with the political situation. The Emperor has conferred on him a posthumous title. If His Majesty continues to distinguish suicides in this enviable manner, he is not unlikely to lose several of his subjects.

Probably this was the sergeant who fired at the Prime Minister.

Saturday, December 9.

Reports from Chinnampo indicate smouldering embers of disturbance. No details are given but Japanese gendarmes and police are said to have been despatched thither. This state of unrest seems to be extending. Representatives of the literati and the lower class are said to be flocking to the capital from Chemulpo and Pyong-yang, their object being to excite the populace of Seoul to a violent demonstration. Korean officials, fearing to be waylaid, are solicitous for Japanese protection, and every possible step is being taken to restore tranquillity. Ex-Premier Li Keun-myong repaired to the Palace on the 7th and presented a petition vehemently protesting against the new Convention. Chin San-heung, Minister of the Board of Decorations, also attempted to obtain access to the Emperor for a similar purpose but was refused audience.

The Asahi's Seoul correspondent gives a different version of the alleged outrage against the Prime Minister Pak Che-soon. He says that the story of a non-commissioned officer assaulting the Premier with a pistol is quite untrue. What happened was that when Mr. Pak was on his way to the Japanese Legation for the purpose of announcing his intention of entering hospital to recuperate his strength, a Korean soldier made a motion of loading his rifle as the Minister's cortège passed. No importance was attached to the incident and Mr. Pak continued his course first to the Japanese Legation and then to the hospital as pre-arranged.

From the same correspondent we learn that although the Emperor's attitude towards the suicides of Min and Cho may have been correct, His Majesty's precipitate action in the case of three other suicides is open to criticism and even to derision. No sooner was the news of a suicide received than the man was raised to a high official rank, whereas it turned out that one of the three petty officials who recently made away with themselves committed the act when in a state of drunken phrensy. There are various stories of men dashing out their brains with stones and so forth, but all are pure inventions.

Sunday, December 10.

Mr. Li Keun-thaik, who formerly opposed the notorious Li Yong-ik and thus acquired some reputation, seems to be very inveterately hostile to the new convention. He made such an obstinate attempt on the evening of the 7th to convert the Emperor to his views, that His Majesty ordered his forcible expulsion from the Palace and he was subsequently arrested by the Japanese. That is a very meagre account. It leaves much to the imagination, and is remarkably lacking in rational coherence.

Prince Li Chai-wan has declined the office of envoy to Japan and it is now thought that the Korean Government will not be in a position to despatch an embassy during the present year.

Original from

The funeral of Min Yong-hwan is to be conducted on the basis of a Minister of State's obsequies and will not take place until five months have elapsed.

The illness of Mr. Pak Che-soon, Prime Minister, is said to have taken a turn for the better.

The German Minister is expected to withdraw from Seoul on the 15th instant.

Monday, December 11.

Reports from Seoul indicate—though the source is not absolutely trustworthy—that the Korean Government is hesitating about the publication of the new Convention or the adoption of the measures indicated by it. On the 8th instant a Cabinet Council is said to have debated these two points without coming to any decision. The tendency of the council was to retain the Foreign Office in nominal existence at all events, and to postpone the promulgation of the convention. It is throughout possible that Japan will have to exert strong pressure in order to correct this mood of procrastination.

The Kokumin Shinbun's correspondent wires that since the 8th instant the Palace has been guarded by a company of Japanese troops to ensure its safety.

The two Koreans designated for the embassy to Japan have declined to accept the appointment.

Investigations have proved that Ku Wan-hwi, formerly chief of police, whose arrest was recently effected, had been engaged in a conspiracy. He has been dismissed from office.

The Asahi Shinbun's correspondent says that on the whole the Korean nation is quiet. Some agitation is perceptible in Pyong-yang, Chemulpo, and one or two other places, but with these exceptions there are no signs of commotion, and things may be described as virtually normal.

Tuesday, December 12.

It is not yet possible to say that things have entirely quieted down in Seoul. The agitators—the "remnants" as they are called—have ceased to find access to the palace, and owing to the effective measures taken by the Japanese police, public meetings of an inflammatory nature are not taking place. But it is alleged that private conference are going on, and that devices for organizing some kind of vehement protest are eagerly discussed. Meanwhile the pro-Russian party are endeavouring to foment a movement in favour of the recall and re-instatement of the notorious Li Yong-ik.

The Japanese Legation in Seoul has adopted the wise course of publishing an official account of the course of the negotiations by way of reply to the mendacious statements circulated by certain newspapers in Seoul and reproduced with semblance of endorsement by certain foreign newspapers in Japan. The account is this:—"Several days' conference between Marquis Ito and Mr. Hayashi on the one hand and the Korean Ministers on the other convinced the latter that in consideration of the peace of the Far East and the situation occupied by Korea, the conclusion of the new Convention was inevitable. Nevertheless it is true that when on the 17th of November the Ministers assembled in the Palace, the Premier, Mr. Han Kiuhwa, declared himself radically opposed to the convention, and with the exception of one or two of his colleagues, all refrained from addressing to the Throne any declaration of conviction that the Convention should be concluded. And it is further true that although the Emperor of Korea was persuaded by his interviews with Marquis Ito and by the latter's careful explanations that the Convention was necessary, His Majesty nevertheless expressed a desire that certain modifications tending to the advantage of the Empire and the Throne's position and dignity should be introduced, and that a postponement should be made for the purpose. He did not, however, endorse the opposition offered by Premier Han and his fellow-thinkers, but on the contrary repeatedly directed them to come to an amicable arrangement with the Japanese Plenipotentiaries. The latter, on their side, stated that while they were willing to introduce any suitable amendments offered by the Koreans, they could not agree to postpone the conclusion of the Convention inasmuch as, in their opinion, circumstances did not admit of delay. Therefore they suggested that the conference should be resumed in the evening of the same day. This was done, and on that occasion nearly the whole of the amendments proposed by the Koreans were embodied in the Convention with Marquis Ito's approval. This was not all. For at the Emperor's direct desire a new clause was inserted at the end of the Convention (the clause guaranteeing the safety and prestige of the Throne). These facts show clearly that the Convention, as finally drafted, embodied the ideas of both of the contracting parties and had their assent. Thereafter the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Pak Che-soon, signed the Convention in the presence of all his colleagues and attached his seal to it. Prior to the latter step and while the discussion of the Convention article by article was going on, the Minister of Foreign Affairs telephoned many times to the Foreign Office for his seal. But the custodian of the seal happening to be absent, it was not until two hours had elapsed that the Chief Secretary arrived with the seal. During the interval between the Foreign Minister's signature and the arrival of his seal, the Emperor expressed to Marquis Ito his satisfaction that an amicable agreement had been reached, and announced his intention of retiring to rest with a tranquil mind, which step he recommended to Marquis Ito also. The Marquis accordingly withdrew before the final conclusion of the Convention. As for the statements that force was employed by the Japanese, the only exhibition of force was that, in view of some indications of disturbance, steps were taken to guard the Japanese and Korean Plenipotentiaries on their return from the Palace."

We presume that the newspapers which have published or reproduced false statements to the effect that the seal of the Korean Minister of Foreign Affairs was forcibly procured by the Japanese and forcibly affixed to the Convention, and that the latter was concluded owing to compulsion, will now withdraw them. We pointed out when these statements appeared that they constituted an insult to Marquis Ito and that no one at all conversant with Far-Eastern politics could credit them. But, as is not infrequent, contradiction has served only to elicit obstinate re-assertions from the original disseminator of the falsehoods. It matters very little whether he will now have the grace to acknowledge his error. The important point is that the truth is known.

Wednesday, December 13.

It appears that the Korean Representative in Paris recently crossed to America and sought an interview with the Assistant Secretary of State, before whom he laid Korea's grievances in the matter of the new convention with Japan, Mr. Min Yong-chha's hope was to enlist the sympathy and active interference of the United States on behalf of Korea's sovereignty. But Mr. Root's reply was eminently discouraging. He told his visitor that the United States Government fully recognised Japan's paramount position as regards Korea and had given instructions that America's relations with the latter should henceforth be conducted through the medium of Tokyo. The Korean Minister is said to have been profoundly disappointed. This is by no means the only attempt made by the Seoul Government to influence American public opinion in favour of Korea's claims. Other irons have been put in the fire and will soon emerge in a more or less incandescent state. Doubtless they will have some effect, but not in official circles, where a distinctly pro-Japanese line has been adopted with full knowledge of the facts and after due deliberation.

All the Japanese newspapers agree in stating that tranquillity has been virtually restored throughout Korea. The arrest of two or three of the leaders of the agitation and the explanations made to them, seem to have produced an excellent effect. Things have quieted down and the Cabinet Ministers are attending to their duties without any display of nervousness. The threatened commotions in Pyong-yang and Chemulpo have not matured and on the whole the nation appears to have resigned itself to the inevitable.

Prince Wi Yang is to come to Japan in acknowledgment of Marquis Ito's embassy. Prince Wi has already visited this country. He performed the same function in connexion with the occasion of Marquis Ito's first visit to Seoul.

Thursday, December 14.

Reports from Seoul indicate that the system of appointing men to office by selection made with reference solely to their ability and not at all to their family connexions, has been inaugurated in the Korean Government, and several appointments have been made under it. This change is said to have exercised a tranquillizing influence on the literati. These have entirely ceased to agitate, and memorials advocating certain administrative reforms are reaching the Cabinet in considerable numbers.

Numbers of foreigners are said to have come to Seoul from Shanghai and Tientsin since the conclusion of the new convention. They do not seem to have any special business but are simply watching the course of events.

Rumours in Seoul go to suggest that Baron Kodama or General Hasegawa is expected to be the first Resident General. We should think the latter appointment very improbable. General Kodama's great recommendation—apart from his altogether exceptional abilities—is that he has given ample evidence of remarkable skill in civil administration as well as in military leadership, whereas General Hasegawa is said to be purely a soldier. Korea does not specially want military rule.

The Asahi Shinbun affirms that the scheme of organization of the Resident General's office and the personality of the Resident General have already been considered and approved by the Privy Council and will be promulgated in a few days.

By the same journal an interesting point is made. The first article of the new Convention says that "the Government of Japan, through the Department of Foreign Affairs in Tokyo, will hereafter have control and direction of the external relations and affairs of Korea," and the 3rd Article says that "the Resident General shall reside at Seoul primarily for the purpose of taking charge of and directing matters relating to diplomatic affairs." It would appear then that the Foreign Office in Tokyo is to discharge exactly the same functions as the Resident General in Seoul, and since the Foreign Minister and the Resident General will be men of equal rank, a clash of duties is very probable, and, at any rate, the drafting of the Convention leaves much to be desired in point of consistency. Our contemporary explains, however, that Marquis Ito was perfectly cognizant of this conflict between Articles 1 and 3, but that he consented to the latter's definition of the Resident General's functions in deference to the earnest desire of the Korean Government. The latter's plain purpose was to impose the narrowest possible limits on the exercise of the Resident General's authority, but the fact is that the deference paid to their wishes has very little practical importance. For, in the first place, it is to be observed that the language of the new convention is "primarily for the purpose of taking charge of and directing." The qualifier "primarily" makes it quite clear that the functions to which it refers may be supplemented by others. In the second place, the 4th Article provides that "the stipulations of all treaties and agreements existing between Japan and Korea not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement shall continue in force." Now the first Article of the convention of February 23rd, 1904, binds the Imperial Korean Government to "place full confidence in the Imperial Government of Japan and adopt the advice of the latter in regard to improvements in administration." This Article continuing in force, it follows that the Resident General will have large advisory functions and that the Korean Government will be bound to follow his advice though using its own machinery and exercising its own authority for the purpose.

The Shogyo Shimpo's correspondent wires that on the night of the 11th instant the Emperor of Korea issued an edict directing that the improvement of administration should be at once undertaken; that the sending in of memorials directed against the new Convention should cease, and that all attempts to excite popular feeling in that sense should be abandoned.

THE BUDGET AS PROPOSED.

It is plain that the policy adopted by the Government in framing the Budget for next fiscal year is based on the assumption that not until 1907 will the country have completely emerged from the era of war expenditures. Peace has been restored, it is true, but the armies are still beyond the seas, and a large part of the cost of bringing them home will have to be delayed in 1906-7. Thus evidently the after-effects of the war will make themselves felt sensibly in next year's outlays and the Government seems well advised in maintaining a strictly conservative attitude until the financial situation has become quite normal. This involves adherence to the programme laid down at the commencement of 1904; the programme that all public works already undertaken should be suspended, with due regard, of course to economical conditions, and all those planned but not yet begun should be deferred. The budget does not, indeed, show strict adherence to that principle. In the schedules of appropriations unconnected with the war sums totalling 41½ million yen are set down for the Communications Department, and at least 38 millions of this total must be for new constructions or for continuing enterprises already commenced. Still there is no largely expansive scheme such as was formulated by the Government in 1896 after the war with China.

It is a welcome fact that at a time when the task of the country's financiers is eminently difficult they have allotted a sum of 1,439,407 yen to works in connexion with customs improvements at Yokohama and Kobe. This is part of a total outlay of 3,960,000 yen, which takes the form of a continuing fund. Evidently the Government's intention is to encourage foreign commerce as much as possible. The same purpose seems to exist with regard to industry. Thus a sum of 191,000 yen is set aside for the construction of a technical school in Kumamoto prefecture and a sum of 324,313 yen for a similar purpose in Sendai. These monies are to be gradually employed, the amounts appropriated in next year's budget being 38,500 yen and 43,000 yen respectively. Another sum of 60,000 yen is to be devoted to perfecting the industrial experiment stations, and 35,000 yen to provide mechanical apparatus for drying figured matting.

An interesting fact is that the Government has resolved to undertake improvements in horse-breeding on a large scale. No less than 720,000 yen are set down for arrangements in connexion with that purpose. It must be assumed that this is only part of a large outlay spread over a number of years, but no information is furnished on that point. There is great divergence of view as to the wisdom of this enterprise. Many persons hold that the Japanese pony is quite good enough for cavalry work in any country where a Japanese army is likely to have to fight. Yet even these critics do not deny that the Japanese pony is not nearly heavy enough or strong enough for artillery purposes. At all events the Japanese military authorities are fresh from a field of conclusive experiences and we must assume that they are well advised in taking this step.

Among the appropriations there appears the sum of 1,820,000 yen devoted to establishing the Iron Foundry. This is an installment of a total amount of 2,857,094 yen, which will be spread over the next five years, and which represents, we presume, the last expenditure on account of the very costly works at Wakamatsu.

There is also an appropriation of 2 million yen for extension of the telephone system. This is badly needed. The Government has hitherto shrunk in an unaccountable manner from developing an enterprise urgently required by the public and quite certain to yield a fine return.

Among the expenditures to be incurred in the sequel of the war, those of a continuing nature are as follow:—

	Yen.
Service of the War Debt	110,000,000
Increase (4 Divisions) of the Army.....	10,000,000
Increase of the Navy.....	4,390,000
Pensions and Annuities	32,000,000
Cost of Collecting Taxes	14,840,000
	171,230,000

Against this outlay the only assured asset seems to be the war taxes which yield 160 million of yen. They would constitute a sufficient asset if a less heroic method of dealing with the war debt were adopted.

Expenditures of an extraordinary nature to be incurred in the sequel of the war—apart from the cost of bringing home the troops and paying rewards and gratuities—are as follow:—

	Yen
Expenses of troops stationed in Manchuria and Korea	20,000,000
Naval Restorations	27,200,000
Army Restorations	25,000,000
Residency-General and Residencies in Korea.....	1,180,000
Cost of manufacturing medals, etc.	3,500,000
Expenses of establishing the Tobacco-manufacturing Monopoly and the Salt Monopoly	4,720,000
Total	81,600,000

Interesting tables have been published showing the ratio borne by the Military and Naval expenditure to the Administrative outlays.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES 1906-7.
Class of Expenditures.	Amount in Yen.	Ratio.
Military and Naval	79,304,437	480
Army	50,269,352	304
Navy	29,035,085	176
Administration	86,031,579	520
Totals	165,336,316	1,000

In this table expenditures on account of the service of the National Debts and on account of pensions and annuities are not included.

"ASSOCIATION AMICALE."

We have received a little volume containing details of the fifth meeting of the "Association Amicale" of the School of the Morning Star. It is a well printed and prettily bound booklet, and its contents bear eloquent testimony to the fine educational work done by the noble philanthropists who constitute the faculty of this well known and justly renowned school. The idea of inducing men to keep unsevered in maturer years the bonds that in their youth bound them to each other and to their alma mater is one which commends itself to every thoughtful person, for its aim is to preserve as long as possible in active operation the beneficent influences of early instruction and friendship. M. Heinrich, director of the Ecole de l'Etoile du Matin, and M. Beuf, Vice-Director, have seen their untiring labours crowned with signal success. Many promising youths have been fitted by these able Frenchmen and their not less able assistants and fellow-workers for the service of Japan and of humanity, and it is significant that as teachers they have shown the rare faculty of winning not only the respect and gratitude but also the love of the lads who have been so fortunate as to come under their care. Without such a feeling of affection this "Association Amicale" could not exist; still less could it grow in numbers and in vigour from year to year as it evidently does. For it is composed not of boys now actually attending the school, but of youths who, having graduated there and entered upon the serious avocation of bread-winning, nevertheless delight to assemble yearly under the familiar old portals and renew their intercourse with one another and with the teachers to whom they owe so much. One reads with pleasure the records of their doing and sayings, for on every page are found evidences of the wholesome atmosphere in which these youths have been brought up and in which they still move.

CHINA.

Friday, December 8.

Viceroy Yuan having been attacked by a sore throat the meeting of the Plenipotentiaries on the 5th instant had to be deferred. Some of the reports speak of the meeting on the 7th also being postponed. The matter is confused, and the only fact which emerges clearly is that there has been a temporary interruption.

The Russian organ in Peking is said to have severely criticised the President of the University for entertaining the Japanese Plenipotentiary on the ground that such an act was improper as constituting an interference on the part of the educational authorities in diplomatic affairs. It is agreeable to learn that the newspaper in question finds nothing more tangible to condemn. In this context it may be mentioned that the Chinese Government has at length decided to organize an Education Department and Mr. Tung Ching has been appointed Minister. The Board of Records is to be under the control of the new Department. Tung Ching is a protégé of Viceroy Yuan, whose influence in this seen to be steadily growing.

Saturday, December 9.

The 12th meeting of the Plenipotentiaries was to be held on the 8th instant.

It is stated that China's recently developed popular policy of recovering and revoking concessions granted to foreigners has extended even to Manchuria, and that petitions are reaching the Government in Peking urging that the terms of the Russo-Japanese Convention should not be recognised, in so far as they relate to such concessions.

Rumour says that the Foreign Representatives in Peking are exhausting every expedient to acquire information as to the course of the negotiations. Reference is made to the methods pursued by some of them, but we find the story incredible.

On the 6th instant the Russian Representative is reported to have visited the Wai-wu-pu, and on the 7th instant the French Legation, both visits being for the purpose of conveying the same intimation, namely, that if China grants to Japan any concessions over and above those contemplated by the Portsmouth Treaty, Russia and France will demand equal concessions elsewhere. This kind of rumour has been so frequently circulated that one finds difficulty in discrediting it altogether. Yet how extremely impolitic such action would be on the part of Russia and France! If these two Powers believe that the grant of any special privileges by China to Japan in Manchuria would justify a demand for the grant of corresponding advantages to France and Russia elsewhere, then their wisest course would be to keep silence until their titles matured, for we must assume that what they oppose is not the mere fact of Japan's success qua Japan, but the possibility of their own countries getting "left." If they do not believe anything of the kind, that is to say, if they do not believe that the most-favoured-nation clause applies to the altogether extraordinary circumstances of the present case, then the procedure ascribed to them is purely vexatious and can only impair their countries' relations with Japan uselessly. Therefore it appears that these rumours must be accepted with reserve. Nevertheless the Chinese Ministers in Washington, Berlin and St. Petersburg are said to have telegraphed to the Wai-wu-pu that the attitude of certain European Powers is one of eager expectancy. They are closely watching China's action in the present negotiations and if she furnishes a pretext they will descend upon her under the agis of the most-favoured-nation clause without reserve. In fact, it is a case of the Three-Power combination in a less conspicuous form than it assumed ten years ago when Japan was driven from Liaotung.

Sunday, December 10.

The 14th meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 9th instant. It is stated that the conference is proceeding satisfactorily and that little remains now to be settled, but evidently all reports on this subject are more or less conjectural. Shanghai telegraphs that Viceroy Yuan will probably return to Tientsin on the 14th, which fact suggests that the discussion is on the eve of settlement.

Russia's negotiations with regard to the Portsmouth Treaty are said to have been commenced between Mr. Pokotiloff and Mr. Tang Showi. They are expected to be brief.

Viceroy Yuan's illness is said to be of an unimportant character, but three nurses were summoned from Tientsin to look after him.

Prince Tsai, the principal of the Five Envoys to Foreign Countries, is to leave Peking on the 11th. He will spend some time in Shanghai and his arrival in Tokyo is anticipated to take place about the 5th or 6th of January.

Monday, December 11.

The 15th meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 10th instant. According to the Hochi Shimbun's correspondent an agreement upon nearly all points has been reached and the Conference will see the end of its labours in about a week. There are three things still unsettled; but what they are the correspondent does not say. He alleges, however, that the Chinese demands include the following; namely, that there must be a limit of time to any telegraphic enterprises of Japan in Manchuria; that bounds must be set to the granting of mining privileges; that the Japanese must not be allowed to interfere in matters of taxation, of fisheries or of timber-felling; and that permission must not be given for any oil-manufacturing enterprise or the construction of any branches of the main railway. These demands are under discussion.

The Peking correspondent of the Jiji Shimpō, in a letter to Shanghai, whence its contents are telegraphed, says that so far as he can learn, the Chinese Government is insisting strenuously upon the preservation of its sovereignty in Hsingking. It has maintained that one half of the cost of the railway must be defrayed—apparently by Japan—as a preliminary to working the line, and that there must be no foreign railway guards. Accurate intelligence is very difficult to obtain, but according to Russian accounts the Chinese take the view that this question must be considered from both sides. If Japan's proposals with regard to Manchuria be agreed to, then Germany, who is now on the point of withdrawing her troops from Shantung, will abandon that measure and will demand to be placed in the some favourable position with regard to Shantung that has been granted to Japan in Hsingking. France also will prefer the same claim with regard to the borders of Tonquin. China, they say, undoubtedly owes much to Japan for breaking Russia's strength and driving her back, but if the Chinese people be invited to pay the debt, their answer is that Japan's declared object will be defeated by such a course. For she has not completed the task she undertook to perform. She has not driven Russia from Manchuria but only from the southern province, leaving Kirin and Amur still in her hands. If then Japan's proposals with regard to Hsingking be carried out, Russia will have to be equally favoured in the two northern provinces, and then the avowed intention of preserving China's integrity will be plainly defeated. Japan is represented by this account as replying, in effect, that she will take measures to guard against these dangers, but the Chinese are not to be re-assured.

We entertain very little doubt that this version of the negotiations comes from Chinese sources not from Russian. For it is a version obviously inspired by Chinese interests. If the situation depicted, or said to be depicted, by the Chinese Plenipotentiaries, were to actually arise, no Power would be better pleased than Russia. The St. Petersburg statesmen know well that there can be little if any hope of driving Japan from Hsingking, certainly not for many years to come, and therefore their only visible consolation would be to obtain a thoroughly commanding position in the two northern provinces of Manchuria. That is the best compensation now within sight. Hence it follows that Russia's game should be to "sit tight" and await any results which may form the basis of demands in Kirin and Amur, instead of now acting the obstructive part attributed to her. As for the Japanese, on the other hand, their obvious answer is that they ask for little if anything more than Russia possessed in Hsingking before her expulsion from that district, nevertheless the concessions made by China to the Great Northern Power did not involve any of the serious consequences now foreseen. Besides, and above all, Japan is acting in accordance with a treaty to which Russia herself is already an assenting party. St. Petersburg, having put its name to the Portsmouth Treaty, can scarcely make the fulfilment of the Treaty an excuse for renewed aggressions.

Germany is as usual an object of suspicion. The Peking correspondent of the Nichi Nichi wires that she is supposed to be watching with much satisfaction the growth of an anti-foreign mood in China, inasmuch as the recrudescence of serious trouble could scarcely fail to bring some grist to her own mill. Her recent action in advocating the withdrawal of foreign forces from Chinese soil just at the moment when the Pelchili manoeuvres created an impression of Chinese military strength, is said to be regarded by the foreign Powers as a deliberate attempt to curry favour with China at the expense of other States.

Suspensions of this kind include such a large subjective element that one naturally hesitates to attach much importance to them. For the rest, it is not impossible that Germany's mood may be such as rumour depicts it so far as welcoming the anti-foreign sentiment is concerned, for the Kaiser has long been credited with a conviction that the Chinese problem will mature into an international trouble of large dimensions, and that the sooner it is resolutely dealt with the easier will be the solution. Concerning the suggestion for the withdrawal of the troops, it is not extravagant to suppose that the evidences of efficiency given by Viceroy Yuan's army in the recent manoeuvres constituted in Germany's eyes a valid reason for handing over to the Chinese Government the duty of safeguarding foreign rights, lives and properties. Certainly it looks like a clever stroke of diplomacy, but why not?

Tuesday, December 12.

It is more than ever difficult to discover the exact course which the negotiations in Peking are taking. The fifteenth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 10th and the sixteenth was to have taken place on the 11th, but its postponement for some unexplained reason is announced. There is talk of a new draft of proposals—which seems incredible at this late period—and there is talk of three cardinal Japanese demands which had been postponed for final consideration and which have now come up for decision. But all this is very vague. At any rate it is evident that a feeling of dissatisfaction and uneasiness is growing up in Japan. The Jiji Shimpō gives an indication of it when it says that a full month has elapsed since the Japanese Plenipotentiaries arrived in Peking, yet no one can say when the negotiations will be concluded or what kind of conclusion they will reach. The indications, so far as they go, are that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries have allowed themselves to be "side-shunted," and that, instead of holding to the main track, they are following the Chinese through devious and divergent issues of a minor nature. That is the Jiji's view, but it is obviously a conjectural view. The fact is, as we have frequently ventured to affirm, that the Chinese have not approached this question in the spirit which might reasonably have been expected. They appear to have shown themselves illiberal, difficult and suspicious, unwilling to recognise accomplished facts and unable to perceive future contingencies. Such, at all events, seems to be the inference suggested by the meagre information hitherto procurable. We can only hope that it will prove an incorrect inference and that the upshot of the negotiations may be more satisfactory than the course of events has hitherto implied.

The Five Commissioners, headed by Prince Tsai, left Peking on the 11th and will reach Japan via Shanghai. An office has been formed in the Chinese capital for the purpose of receiving and collating their reports and making preparations for the operation of the constitution. The Commissioners were long delayed by the bomb-throwing outrage, which remains still a mystery. So far as their visit to Japan is concerned, however, they will have lost nothing by the delay, for they will probably find themselves in Tokyo just as the Japanese Diet is sitting, and just as it is dealing with some questions not unlikely to rouse tumultuous discussion. It will be very interesting to learn how a national assembly in such circumstances commends itself to the Chinese statesmen's appreciation.

Another question of jurisdiction seems to have arisen in Shanghai. So far as we can gather from somewhat meagre telegrams, the trouble had its origin in a dispute as to whether a woman, or some women, kidnapped in Szechuan and discovered in the foreign settlement, whither she or they had been brought for an obvious purpose, should be detained in the Chinese prison, pending final inquiry, or should go to the consular jail. The telegraph alleges that the settlement police obtained possession of the woman by forcible or surreptitious means—we can not decipher which—and that the Chinese population are much excited. Their leaders, numbering 200, have waited on the Taotai, and urged that application be made for the withdrawal of the British Consul's exequatur. The Taotai, in reply, pledged himself to exhaust every device furnished by his official position for the assertion of China's sovereign rights, and the complication threatens to assume serious proportions. It is certainly unfortunate that such a question should have presented itself at the very moment when the Chinese nation is invaded by a wave of excitement about the "rights recovery" problem. Telegrams say that the latter is attracting more attention than ever, and that it has now become almost a furore in some quarters.

It appears that this line was gradually constructed by General Kuroki's forces as they advanced from the Yalu to Liaoyang. Consequently the road passes Kiulien-ching, Honmutang, Pangshan-ching, Fenhwang-ching, Tsao-ho-kou, Lienshan-kwan, Kiaotow and Penhsi fu. The total distance is 385 kilometers. Of course the line is now of the military gage, but it will be altered so as to have the same gage as the Fusan-Wiju and Mukden-Liaotung roads.

Wednesday, December 13.

It is stated that the sixteenth meeting of the Plenipotentiaries was held on the 12th instant and that an agreement was reached as to the principal points by mutual concessions. But the latter part of the account is not explicit. Meanwhile the social entertainments continue briskly and if an amicable settlement be not reached, it certainly will not be for want of conviviality. It is perhaps a good sign that Baron Komura's return begins to be spoken of, and that his itinerary is mentioned, namely, via Dairen and Chemulpo.

It appears that the Five Chinese Commissioners are to divide into two parties. Messrs. Tan Hwang and Tsai Funtzu are proceeding by man-of-war to Woosung, where they will embark in the Siberia and come direct to Japan. The other three Commissioners left Tientsin on the 11th for Shanghai where they will take a Nippon Yusen Kaisha steamer for Japan.

Thursday, December 14.

The Nichi Nichi's Peking correspondent says that the 16th meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 12th instant and that Prince Ching, who had been absent owing to illness ever since the second meeting, attended on the occasion. Much interest centred on the meeting as it was understood that the most important questions embodied in Japan's proposals would then be finally discussed, questions for whose special consideration a day's leisure had been accorded. But it was found that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries were not yet prepared to give a definite answer and the meeting rose infecta. The Kokumin's correspondent, however, gives a slightly different complexion to the affair, he says that the cardinal points still remaining unsettled received full consideration at the meeting on the 12th and that the Chinese Plenipotentiaries promised to give definite answers on the 13th.

Twenty-three men have been arrested at Lienchen, and the colonel in command is likely to lose his head, as he had only 23 untrained men under his command when the fatal riot broke out.

In reference to the Tientsin-Chinkiang Railway, the Waiwupu has informed the German Minister that the agreement was only a draft, and never properly ratified, and in any case the period within which it was to be begun has been exceeded. That the German and British Ministers will accept this denial is not to be supposed.

The report of the Ewo Cotton Spinning and Weaving Co., Ltd., for the year ended the 31st of October last, shows a divisible balance of Tls. 265,940, on a paid-up capital of Tls. 750,000. The General Managers propose to pay a dividend of Tls. 8 per share, or 16 per cent., to carry forward Tls. 100,000, and to transfer the balance, Tls. 45,940, to Renewals and Repairs Account.

The Government Council has decided that the central mint for the coining of copper pieces shall be established at Tientsin, and a branch one at Shanghai, both to be under the control of the Board of Revenue. The provincial mints are to be abolished.

Their Highnesses Tsai Hsun and Tsai Tao, brothers of the Emperor, will proceed to Japan and the United States respectively, to pursue a course of studies.

Viceroy Chang Chih-tung has concluded with a British firm a loan of Tls. 1,000,000 for fifteen years at six per cent, to supply Wuchang with electric light and a water-works department.

Owing to the large and daily increasing number of students from the province of Kiangsu who are now gaining a modern education in Japan, and the necessity of exercising some sort of control over the youths there, H. E. Chou Fu, in his capacity of Viceroy of the province, has appointed a Taotai, named Mei, to the post of Inspector of Kiangsu students in Japan, whose duties will be equivalent to a Commissioner of Education in control of the students of the province studying in Japan.

The Waiwupu is reported to have explained to the Diplomatic Body that the native gentry and people cannot be blamed for wanting to keep all railways, etc., in their own hands; this, however, is not the policy of the Chinese Government, which is only proposing to cancel concessions whose time limit for the commencement of operations has expired.

The Shen-pao states that it has received reliable news from the North to the effect that the High Commissioners were to leave Peking on the 11th instant; further, their Excellencies Tuan Fang and Tai Hung-tze will first visit Japan, while Duke Tsai Tseh and the other two Commissioners will go to Europe. The party are booked to leave Shanghai by the P. M. steamer Siberia on the 18th December.

THE JAPANESE PRIZE COURTS.

Under the above heading the following correspondence has appeared in The Times :—

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

London, October 24.
On more than one occasion the Japanese Government has taken steps in connexion with captured vessels and cargoes which certainly have had the appearance of prejudging the decision of the Prize Courts. Vessels and cargoes have been publicly sold before condemnation, and sometimes even before the preliminary judgments concerning them had been delivered. It has been announced that judgment in the case of the American steamer Montara, seized while engaged in the Kamchatkan fur trade, would be delivered on November 4, yet on October 28 a public sale is to take place of skins which could only be those which have been taken from the Montara. Even if the Japanese had an overwhelming case against the Montara and her cargo of furs, they would seriously prejudice their claim to condemn them by selling the captured property this week. No one will now believe that the vessel had an impartial trial.

Sir,—Your Marine Insurance Correspondent in your issue of to-day states that the Japanese Government have prejudged the decisions of their Prize Courts by the sale of vessels and cargoes before judgment, and he cites as an instance the sale of a cargo of furs to be held on October 28 before judgment on November 2. It appears, therefore, desirable to point out that a Prize Court has power to sell a cargo or ship before judgment on account of their condition. This power is expressly given to the British Prize Court by the Naval Prize Act, 1864. It is probable that in the case of this cargo of furs an order was made by the Court for its sale on account of its condition, just as a similar order might be made in a British Prize Court in a similar case. If this is so, your correspondent would appear to be well advised merely to state facts and not draw conclusions from them.

Yours faithfully,
E. S. ROSCOE.

THE CHINESE STUDENTS IN TOKYO.

Monday, December 11.

There are as yet no clear signs of calm being restored among the eight thousand Chinese students now in Tokyo. They complain that discrimination is exercised against them in the matter of control, and they are thus placed on a footing different from that occupied by students of any other nationality. The immediate cause of umbrage is the recent issue of certain regulations by the Education Department. These require that every Chinese subject seeking education in Japan must provide himself with a letter from his country's Minister in Tokyo; that the Japanese Authorities will indicate certain schools as fitted to receive such students; and that Chinese students attending such schools will be required to live in places selected and superintended by the Authorities. The first of these restrictions does not appear to seriously trouble the students. It is against the second, and above all against the third, that they gird angrily, declaring that they are treated as slaves, that such restraints are intolerable, that they came to Japan of their own free choice and can quit this country with equal freedom, that the whole world is open to them, and that they will, by their conduct, confirm the Occident's growing conviction that China is not to be trifled with. In fact they display a great deal of youthful emotion and effervescence, and their manifesto, if it be correctly rendered into Japanese, is a document bombastic even to the verge of ridicule. Rumour says that their real cause of anger is the regulation subjecting them to supervision and restraint in the extra-academical hours. And rumour also says that this regulation is quite essential, many of the students having fallen into dissipation such as not only ruins their own prospects but also constitutes a contaminating influence. The Educational Authorities are understood to take a very firm stand. They declare that the new regulations are absolutely indispensable; that they are the outcome of carefully garnered experience and that under no circumstances shall they be rescinded. The students, it is further alleged, have been betrayed into misinterpreting the rules and are misled in many directions by the wealthy among their number whose manner of life would not support the scrutiny contemplated by the new system. We are compelled to say that if the manifesto attributed (Chuo Shimbun) to these Chinese youths be genuine, their frame of mind is anything but wholesome.

Tuesday, December 12.

The Chinese students continue on strike, and are betraying a remarkable degree of excitement. Some designing person seems to have put it into their head that to be assisted in their choice of schools, restricted in their selection of lodging houses, and subjected to supervision, in extra-academical hours, would be to endure the treatment of slaves. The regulations are inspired solely by a desire to promote the welfare of the students themselves, but the youths talk about liberty and free men's rights and are behaving on the whole with much unreason.

Thursday, December 14.

The Chinese Minister in Tokyo is said to have telegraphed to the Waiwupu that in consequence of the commotion caused among the Chinese students by recently enacted regulations of the Japanese Educational Authorities, he has visited the Foreign Office and the Education Department and has endeavoured to obtain a modification of the regulations. In this he has been unsuccessful, while, on the other hand, he finds the students equally obdurate, and he consequently apprehends that the relations between the two countries may be disturbed. The students also are said to have communicated their complaint to newspapers in China. It is difficult to understand the reasons for this commotion. The rules said to be so objectionable consist in the main of provisions that the introduction of their own Minister must be obtained by students desiring to enter public or private schools in Japan; that the schools eligible for the purpose shall be officially selected and announced; that the same process of selection and announcement shall be adopted with regard to lodging houses, and that such lodging houses shall be subject to official supervision. It appears to us, and it must appear to any impartial person, that students who are really earnest in their pursuit of knowledge would not object to these restrictions and ought rather to welcome them. Without attaching importance to the utterances of sensational journals in Tokyo, we can not wholly overlook the revelations lately made by a certain newspaper as to the manner of life of the Chinese students residing in the Japanese capital. If those revelations be at all credible, then assuredly there is ample cause for the supervisory system now inaugurated by the authorities. On the other hand the ages of the Chinese students range from 16 years to 40, and it is easy to conceive that those among them who have reached full maturity might strenuously object to any scrutiny whatever into their private lives. At all events the students must imagine that they have a measure of right on their side. Evidently their temper is much roused, if we may rely on the Chuo Shimbun's version of a manifesto said to have been compiled by them in connexion with this incident. Its language is extremely vehement. It declares that in the dragon-and-tiger conflict now taking place between China and the Powers of the world, it is to the students that China owes her titles of equality. The students are free men. They are earnest men. They are combined. They have the right to walk with upright mien and hold carriage before their four hundred millions of countrymen. They are not slaves. It is they who have roused the world on the subject of the treaty between America and their country. Slavery in the West is almost extinct. Is it to commence now in the East? Those that would inaugurate it are the very men who proclaim liberty and equality. The students who are to lead China along her future road will rather die for freedom than live as slaves. The newly enacted regulations are ostensibly for the purpose of preserving good order and morality, but Japanese students are not subjected to such restraints, nor are students in Europe and America. That Chinese students alone should be subjected to them would be a disgrace to "our ancestral country." "The Japanese Constitution guarantees liberty of person. China's relations with Japan are relations of equality. We are entitled to the same treatment as Japanese subjects. But the restrictions that it is proposed to impose on us outside school deprive us of practical liberty. They are an uncivilized Japanese device to destroy civilized laws. We will never submit to them." Such is the alleged language of the manifesto, and thus far no indications are apparent that the students have changed their mood. Their leaders are said to number about 500, and even the female students have joined the strike. In the Niroku Shimpō we read that an idea prevails among the malcontents that a big German school is about to be built and equipped at Kiaochow, and that they can repair thither if they have to quit Japan.

Friday, December 15.

The Japanese Educational Authorities have issued an explanatory document with the object of calming the Chinese students, who appear to be growing more and more excited, and to be contemplating departure from Tokyo. The gist of the document is that the regulations to which the students take exception are dictated solely by a desire to promote the interests of the students themselves, and are not at all inspired by any intention of interfering with their personal liberty. Thus the provisions relating to the selection and designation of suitable schools by the Japanese Authorities, and to the necessity of being furnished with a certificate from the Chinese Minister when entering or leaving a school, are based solely on the considerations that Chinese subjects can not possibly possess accurate knowledge as to the most suitable educational institutions in Japan and that the natural course to avoid error in this important respect is to obtain official aid. With regard to any supervision exercised by the Authorities after a student has entered a school, there is no differentiation between Chinese subjects and Japanese subjects. Both are treated exactly alike. But inasmuch as youths studying at certain officially designated and officially recognised schools are entitled to certain special privileges, the exercise of a measure of official supervision is obviously natural and essential. There are some minor points referred to in this context, but we need not explain them in full, as they are plainly innocuous so far as the present commotion is concerned. The real question turns on the selection and control of lodging-houses where students board. It is to this extra-mural supervision of their doings that the students seriously object, and the explanation given by the Education Department is simple and straightforward. It points out that the new system is adopted chiefly for the sake of the student. If men or lads studying at Japanese schools desire, singly or in combination, to hire houses for themselves and set up messes, they will not be liable to any official supervision or interference whatever. But if they live at boarding-houses, for the proper control of which the Japanese Authorities are responsible, since the police issue licenses to such institutions, then it is only right that some effort should be made to protect them against designing and dishonest persons who find their account in promoting dissoluteness among the students. All youths of a really earnest and studious turn of mind should welcome official endeavours to check the abuses prevalent in many of the geshuku-ya, and what the Japanese authorities have done is merely to indicate such lodging-houses as are judged suitable. This is not in any sense a new measure. Already the kishuku-ya where Imperial University students may lodge, and the geshuku-ya where other students may find accommodation, receive permits from the institutions concerned, and what has now been done in the case of the Chinese students is to enact that they too, like their Japanese confreres, must not resort to lodging-houses other than these duly selected ones. If they choose to lodge in private houses or to set up house on their own account, they may withdraw themselves completely from all official supervision, but if they live in officially licensed establishments they must expect to submit to the same limitations as Japanese students do.

Original from

The Faculty of the Waseda University have also addressed to the Chinese students a document explaining the hallucinations under which the latter seem to labour.

In spite of these efforts to enlighten them the bulk of the students continue recalcitrant, and many are leaving Tokyo while others have commenced preparations to leave. Some are said to be so incensed that they will not even buy articles of Japanese manufacture. The Asahi Shimbun urges the greatest firmness in dealing with these students. Their attitude is wholly unreasonable. If they expected to find in Japan schools enjoying and granting to their scholars license so unlimited as is now demanded, they are greatly mistaken. Japan does not want them if they do not want Japan.

In the Jiji it is stated that many of the students talk of going to Tientsin and there establishing a big educational institution where no Japanese, English or American teachers shall be admitted, and where the faculty shall consist entirely of Russians, Germans and Frenchmen.

NAVAL NOTES.

Admiral Togo has been appointed Chief of the Naval Staff (Gun-shireibu-cho) in succession to Admiral Viscount Ito, who becomes Principal Adviser to the Admiralty; Vice-Admiral Kamimura becomes Chief of the Department of Material (Kansai Hombu) and Vice-Admiral Kataoka becomes Commander-in-Chief of the Standing Squadron.

The Naval Authorities report that the disinterments effected at the Western base of Pelyushan, under the superintendence of Commander Mori, resulted in the identification of 31 bodies of officers and men who met death in the blocking operations at Port Arthur. There were other corpses—24 in number—too much decayed to be recognisable, and in some cases the work of identification was rendered more difficult by the absence of any clothing. The digging operations lasted from the 8th to the 14th of November, and the names of those recognised are now published. Briefly stated they are Lieut. Kasawara and 4 men of the Otoru Maru; Commander Yuasa and 2 men of the Sagami Maru; Commander Mukai, Lieut. Itoyama and 12 men of the Asagao Maru, and Commander Shiraishi and 8 men of the Sakura Maru.

It appears that the ceremony connected with the launch of the Tsukuba had actually commenced when the experts became convinced that the launch must be postponed. The Crown Prince and Prince Fushimi together with all the other distinguished persons who had repaired to Kuro, were duly assembled and Admiral Yamamoto was on the point of reading aloud the document naming the ship, when an expert ran up and it became at once evident that something had happened. The fact was that a heavy storm and a high tide on the preceding night had forced up the submerged part of the launching slip, and it had been found impossible to lower it into the original place in time for the ceremony. Nothing could be done except to postpone the launch. It is most unfortunate that this contretemps, trivial though it is, should have marred the launching of Japan's first home-built big cruiser. Some accounts say that the launch was to be deferred for one day only, but others speak for the 15th or 16th as likely to be chosen. Our latest news is that the next high tide must be awaited.

The crews who are to proceed to England for the purpose of taking over the Katori and the Kashima have been nominated. Commander Sakamoto takes charge of the Katori and Commander Ijichi of the Kashima.

It is stated that the Mikasa will be floated by next March at latest. The nature of the bottom and the depth of the water have impeded the operations.

The departure of the Sinwo (Pobieda) from Port Arthur was announced some time ago. But owing to the rough weather recently prevailing she had to put into Tairen, which port she left on the 9th instant. She is expected to reach Saselo to-day (14th).

The operations for raising the Novik have been rendered abortive by violent winds and by the advent of winter. It is now stated that she can not be floated before next spring.

The Official Gazette of the 12th instant announces a number of changes in the organization of the Navy. The first (which refers to Imperial Ordinance No. 258) effects an alteration of the Regulations relating to War-ships and Steamers. The 2nd article is made to read that ships of war shall consist of (1) war-ships; (2) torpedo craft; (3) submarines (sensui-tei); (4) transports; (5) hospital-ships; (6) repair ships (hosaku-sen); and (7) miscellaneous-duties ships (satsuyaki-sen). This, we presume, is a reform dictated by experiences garnered in the war, and it may be taken for granted that many of the captured vessels will serve as repair-ships and miscellaneous-duties craft.

The second change is in the Destroyer Regulations (Imperial Ordinance No. 260). It says that destroyer squadrons shall be stationed, according to necessity, in naval ports and fortified harbours, and that a destroyer squadron shall consist of at least 2 vessels.

The third (Ordinance No. 261) is identical with the second, except that "submarine squadron" is substituted for "destroyer squadron."

The fourth (Ordinance No. 262) provides that torpedo corps (suirai-dan) shall be stationed at each naval port, shall be attached to the port admiralty and shall discharge duties of defence with torpedoes.

The fifth change (same Ordinance) is that torpedo-laying squadrons and torpedo squadrons shall be stationed at each naval port, a torpedo squadron to consist of at least two torpedo-boats.

The last change (Ordinance No. 263) is that Ominato, in the Shimokita district of Mutsu province, is made a fortified port and its limits are fixed.

The Russian Government has appointed a commission to inquire into the circumstances of the naval battle which took place in the Pacific on August 10th, 1904, between the Russian First Squadron and the Japanese Fleet. This was the remarkable fight in which Admiral Togo with 4 battle-ships and 2 armoured cruisers, dispersed and drove back 6 Russian battle-ships and 4 cruisers. It was the battle that decided the fate of the great Russian Pacific Squadron, and doomed the ships to become a part of the Port Arthur fortifications and to share the latter's end. The Russians claimed subsequently that victory was almost within their grasp when an accident to the steering gear of the flag-ship Tsarevitch threw the whole line out of order and reduced it to a mob of vessels within effective range of the Japanese secondary armament. Had the naval combat ended there, had there been no subsequent opportunities of estimating the relative fighting potency of Russian ships and Japanese ships, the claim made after the 10th of August might have received some credence. But the public, instructed as they were instructed afterwards by unmistakable object-lessons, decline to believe that the battle of the 10th of August constituted a solitary exception. Nevertheless many questions of the highest interest remain to be answered in connexion with the fight, and the result of the investigation will be impatiently awaited.

The launch of the big cruiser is postponed until the 26th when the tide will serve. In consequence of this delay the Crown Prince and his suite will return at once to Tokyo.

THE "JIJI SHIMPO" AND THE "JAPAN MAIL."

The Jiji Shimpō explains that we have mistaken for an expression of opinion what was merely a statement of alleged fact. The reference is to the University affair. In the Jiji's columns there appeared a report that the Minister of State for Education had deferred action with reference to President Yamakawa's resignation until the Ministry's political convenience freed him, the Minister's hand. Commenting on this we said:—

Such a policy would be at once undignified and time-serving as the Jiji fully recognises. But we are obliged reluctantly to confess that the Jiji's inveterate antipathy towards the present Cabinet ever since the Portsmouth peace has assumed dimensions which deprive the great journal of the high credit it once enjoyed for mental equilibrium and dispassionate judgment. Its versions of matters in which the Ministry are concerned, must now be taken with reserve whereas formerly they could be credited implicitly.

We certainly did suppose, and do still suppose, that when a newspaper publishes an item of intelligence as the result of its own enquiries, such intelligence must be regarded as the newspaper's version of the affair in question. In this instance we frankly admit, as we did in our subsequent issue, that the Jiji's version was largely borne out by the attitude of the Faculty of the University, though the more recent inquiries made by ourselves go to show that the cause thus assigned is secondary rather than primary. It is necessary, none the less, to apologise to the Jiji and to declare that ample justification existed for its version. We are nevertheless compelled to adhere to our added comments, and we desire the Jiji to understand that they represent, not merely our own individual opinion, but the opinion of many other admirers of the great Japanese journal. The attitude taken by our contemporary towards the Portsmouth Treaty was to us a profound surprise. It was precisely to the Jiji we should have looked for light and leading at such a juncture, nor can we doubt that had the Jiji's appreciation been more moderate and better judged, Japan's escutcheon would never have received the one and only blot that now disfigures it. It is not perhaps too much to say that we who have watched the career of the Jiji Shimpō from the first hour of its publication, and have rejoiced over its journalistic triumphs, are among the sincerest mourners over its want of equilibrium in the matter of the peace negotiations.

The death is announced of Judge Kameyama of the Court of Cassation. The funeral will take place on Dec. 15th at Aoyama.

MILITARY MATTERS.

After Field Marshal Marquis Oyama had made his report to the Emperor on the 7th instant, His Majesty addressed to him the following message:—

"As commander-in-chief of the Manchurian armies, which duty you assumed last year, you have shown signal prowess in ten battles, large and small, and have achieved the purpose with which the war was undertaken, thus satisfying my hopes. On receiving the report which you have just made of the general condition of the campaign, I applaud the high merit you have displayed and the loyalty and valour of my officers and soldiers."

Handsome presents were then conferred on the Field-Marshal by the Emperor and Empress.

During the banquet which followed, Marquis Yamagata delivered an address of appreciation. He said that the name of joshu-shogun (Ever-victorious general) ought to be given to Marquis Oyama, and he spoke in the highest terms of the strategical ability displayed by General Kodama.

General Kuroki, being the first of the Army Commanders to reach Tokyo, was received with an enthusiastic demonstration on the morning of the 9th. It is evident that the long and splendid services done by the First Army, under his leadership, are fully appreciated by his countrymen, and that they remember above all what an immense load of anxiety he removed from their minds when, on the banks of the now historic Yalu, he demonstrated for the first time that a Japanese Army could encounter and defeat a Russian. Up to that memorable first of May the great question had awaited a practical solution. There was no outward evidence of solicitude on the side of the Japanese, but they must have keenly felt the strain of suspense from the landing at Chemulpo on the 10th February until the capture of Kiulien-ching on the 1st of May. Kuroki's name was then on everybody's lips, and though, as the tide of war gathered volume and extent, so that at last a huge rampart of Japanese forces stretched from the Yalu to the Liao and forced the Russians steadily northward, other great captains received their share of public attention, Kuroki and his gallant army never ceased to be heard of in every important engagement, so that perhaps among all the heroes of the war no names are engraved more deeply upon the nation's heart than those of Kuroki, Nogi, Togo and Kodama. If foreign onlookers were asked, they would unanimously add to this list the name of Major-General Fujii, General Kuroki's chief of staff, an officer of whom much will certainly be heard in the future. General Kuroki and his Staff were met at Shimbashi by representatives of the Emperor and the Crown Prince, and by Prince Fushimi and Prince Kitashirakawa. The crowds collected opposite the station and along the route, cheered to the echo as the procession of carriages passed towards the Palace and there was the usual storm of fireworks from the Hibiya Park.

The General's report to the Emperor was brief. "Since I had the honour," he said, "to be entrusted with the onerous duty of leading the van of the Imperial armies beyond the seas, twenty months have elapsed, counting from the date of the landing at the mouth of the Tadong. During that interval we have fought over 50 engagements, large and small, with a great and powerful enemy in regions presenting extreme difficulties and remote from the habitations of men. In spite of our incompetence we have happily succeeded in discharging without any very conspicuous error the grave duty entrusted to us by Your Majesty, and it is owing to the Imperial Virtues and to the guardianship of the Sacred Ancestors, that we have now the honour and the unspeakable happiness of returning victorious to bow before the Throne. We have been further greatly helped in the discharge of our duties by the admirable plans and instructions of our superior officers, by the coöperation of the two services and the aid rendered by the Navy, and by the thoroughly efficient manner in which the non-combatant branches carried out their functions. All these factors have powerfully combined to ensure success. Now, at this moment of reverentially reporting to Your Majesty the conclusion of my duties, I am deeply moved by the thought that so many of Your Majesty's loyal and brave officers and soldiers have perished on the field and can not be present to share with us the honour of this day."

The Emperor's Message to his General was couched in the usual brief but pregnant terms: "At the head of the First Army you broke the strong foe at the Yalu and thereafter, carrying the war into many districts, displayed prowess on every occasion and well discharged your duty. You have indeed satisfied my wishes, and now receiving your personal report of the results of the fighting, I express my admiration of your services and of the bravery and loyalty of the officers and men under your command." Various handsome presents were given to the General and his Chief of Staff.

The city is to present to Marquis Oyama a sword of honour as it did to Admiral Togo.

General Oku and his staff are expected to return to Japan in the middle of January, and General Nogi and his staff in the middle of February. General Nozu and the staff of the Fourth Army will be the last.

It is stated that the repatriation of the Russian troops will prove a much more protracted matter than had been anticipated. The causes of delay are said to be injuries to the circum-Baikal line—which from the first was a frail hurried construction—and strikes on the part of the railway staff. It appears further, that the recent rumours of disturbances in Harbin were not untrue. Lack of provisions and unfairness, as they supposed, in deciding the order of the troops return to Russia, led to an emeute which was not quelled until General Madoriloff entered the town at the head of his Cossacks. There is said to have been a sharp encounter.

The organizers of the Tokyo celebrations in honour of the returning troops are confronted by the difficulty that an arrangement similar to that made in the case of the Navy is not possible in the case of the Army owing to the latter's greater numbers. It has therefore been decided that a banquet shall be provided at Uyeno for the officers only and that a quantity of edibles and potables shall be sent to the barracks for the use of the rank and file. The great feature of the day (17th) will be that the two Divisions, the Guards and the First Division, will march from Shinagawa to Uyeno wearing the same uniform that they wore and carrying the same accoutrements that they carried on their return from the front. Thus the city will have an opportunity of seeing and cheering these heroes marshalled in war-like order. Apparently the men are to march back from Uyeno to their barracks without any refreshments, so that beyond the honour of being acclaimed by the multitudes they will not have a very enjoyable time.

The Japanese Army has hitherto been organized on the Divisional-unit system (shidan hon-i), but it is henceforth to be organized on the Army-unit system (gundan hon-i). Each Army will consist of two Divisions, and the Generals commanding Armies will be selected from both the veteran and the younger classes, and will have seats at the Grand Military Council. We presume that the Guards Division will not be included in the system. Without the Guards there are 16 Divisions—including the four newly raised during the war and to be retained on the effective list—so that there will be eight Army Generals. During the war the Japanese Army Corps consisted of 3 Divisions—in rare cases of 4—, but it was probably found that in view of the greatly extended front over which troops now operate, two Divisions are as much as one General can effectively command.

QUESTIONS OF MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

Mr. Otis Cary, in a letter published in our correspondence columns on the 7th instant, discusses the question of mothers-in-law in Japan and takes strong exception to a statement made by us when reviewing Bishop Awdry's comments on Japanese morality, namely, that "the mother-in-law problem does not constitute in Japan a greater trouble than it does in any European country so far as a woman is concerned." We frankly admit, on examining this statement, that it is misleading. In discussing Bishop Awdry's analysis we had in view solely the class of Japanese who would be likely to marry foreign wives and the class of foreign parents to whom Bishop Awdry's observations in The Times were addressed. To avoid all misapprehension we should have clearly stated this limitation, though it was unnecessary for the purposes of our immediate argument. The mother-in-law problem does undoubtedly enter largely into the life of middle and low-class Japanese women. They have to thank China for that fact. Originally—and tradition here takes us back to the days of Susano-o—to take a wife involved the idea of setting up a separate establishment on her account. Then followed an age when a wife was left to live with her own parents, receiving there the visits of her husband. And then came the time when the Confucian doctrine of filial piety enjoined the residence of married couples under the same roof with the man's family. But in the upper classes of modern Japan it has become customary—except in the case of an eldest son and not always even in his case—for a man to live apart from his parents when he marries, and in the instances hitherto recorded of marriages between Japanese gentlemen and foreign ladies, we have never heard that the mother-in-law question caused any trouble. Most assuredly it is not a difficulty that would have occurred to us as necessary to adduce by way of warning to European or American girls against contracting Japanese marriages.

There is another point made by Mr. Cary. He suggests that we have of late been too prone to recall the moral condition of "England and America" when referring to the conditions that exist in Japan, and he apprehends that if the Japanese "are constantly assured that they are in all respects equal and in most respects superior to others, one powerful incentive to reform is taken away."

We do not consider that our occasional comments are justly summarized by Mr. Otis Cary in this reference, but without disputing that question we desire to ask him frankly whether he does not think that many critics of Japan would do well if they looked at home before formulating unfavourable judgments abroad. And we would further ask him whether in his frank opinion, anything can so effectually discredit criticism of a foreign nation as a perception on the part of the criticised that the critic ignores among his own nationals the prevalent existence of precisely the faults he detects in others. It is not a conjecture of our own, it is a conviction acquired by long observation, that the Japanese are quite clear-sighted enough to observe the skeletons in foreign cupboards, and that whereas they readily accept advice, they are equally ready to resent strictures based on false assumptions of superiority. But in point of fact our own comments, to which Mr. Otis Cary takes exception, have never been intended to bear the comparative interpretation they suggest to him, nor have ever been inspired by a desire to represent the Japanese as better than other peoples. What we have sought to show is that attempts to place them low down in the scale of national morality by attributing to them faults and failings which exist equally among nations of high standing, are unfair and can only provoke a sense of injustice.

RUSSIA'S FUTURE POLICY.

A correspondent sends the following interesting article to The Times :—

It is still too soon to predict with confidence the effect of the treaty of Portsmouth on the foreign policy of Russia, but there are already preliminary indications of future possibilities which are not without interest. Some Russians are of opinion that, after a period of repose and reorganization, their country ought to take up anew the realization of what they regard as her historical mission in the Far East, whereas others maintain that she ought to seek another and more profitable field for her activity. Among these latter is General Alexander Kireyef, who has just expounded his views at great length in a letter to the Novoye Vremya. Of these views the most important are by no means original, but they have, perhaps, never before been advocated publicly by a Russian, and on that account the letter deserves attention. Hitherto they have been regarded in St. Petersburg and Moscow rather as malicious inventions of Russia's enemies, and any Russian who, a year or two ago, should have ventured to espouse them publicly would have been regarded as almost a traitor to Fatherland.

General Kireyef, who is well known in St. Petersburg, and whose patriotism is above suspicion, begins by recognizing accomplished facts. He says :—

We have been thrown back for a long time, if not for ever, from the Pacific Ocean. That is the principal result of the war, which many people, from misapprehension, regret. Yes; in the Lia-tung Peninsula, in Manchuria, in Korea, our place has been taken by Japan. That is very painful for our amour propre, but there is nothing in it which is prejudicial to our interests, and I see in it an unquestionable good. That is the good side of the treaty of peace.

The generally accepted doctrine that Russia must strive to reach an ice-free port is then subjected to a searching criticism and declared to be "one of the most dangerous delusions for our (Russian) foreign policy." Open ports in the Pacific and elsewhere are necessary for Germany, France, and England, because these countries have really important commercial interests in the Pacific, and because they have to struggle with each other for a continuous and quick export of products and population; but the position of Russia is very different :—

What have we to transport by the Trans-Siberian railway to the ice-free port on the Yellow Sea, for the Japanese, the Chinese, the Americans, or the Australians? . . . Where in our country do we find over-production and density of population? Is not Siberia still empty? And who is there to prevent our subjects from settling in China, Japan, Oceania, Australia, and America? For that there is no necessity for an ice-free port. All our products and trade go to the West or the South, either by land or by the Baltic and the Black Sea. Up to the present time our chief exports to Japan consist of fish, sugar, and petroleum. . . . These require no Trans-Siberian railway and no ice-free port on the Pacific; they go by sea and will never go by rail. If our products should be unexpectedly found by the Japanese, Chinese, or Polynesians better and cheaper than the products of other countries they will be readily purchased, no matter from what port they come.

Switzerland sells her watches and Belgium her machines without having any ports or fleets. . . . As for our intellectual and moral productions, our anxiety for their exportation is quite legitimate, because our civilization, being Christian, stands certainly higher than that of China, Japan, and Polynesia. But for such exports do we require an ice-free harbour? We shall propagate our culture and our religion by peaceful means, and for that we require no fortified port or ironclad fleet. There is, however, another cause urging us to obtain a firm footing on the shores of the Yellow Sea and the Pacific Ocean—a fantastic cause existing in the minds of some journalists—the warlike desire to rule on the shores of the Pacific. But what does that mean?

General Kireyef replies to the question by explaining that in order to "rule on the shores of the Pacific" it would be necessary to carry through successfully a desperate struggle with the nations already settled on its shores, and that this tremendous war would have to be waged, not on land, where Russia is strong, but at sea, "where we have shown ourselves so weak." And supposing Russia ruined herself in the construction of a fleet such as has never been seen and gained the command of the sea, what advantage would she derive from it? The unimpeded importation into China, Japan, America, &c., of her material and moral products, which is already possible under existing conditions. After considering all this the writer naturally draws the conclusion :— "It is time for us to understand that we have no essential interests in the Far East, and that for the guaranteeing of the modest part which we have a right to play in the Pacific we have no need to expend blood or gold."

It must not, however, be supposed that the gallant general wishes his country to abandon all great ideas and descend politically to the level of Switzerland and Belgium. On the contrary, he wishes her to act a great part in the world; but he advises her to confine herself to the field of activity which has been destined for her by Providence, and from which she has been temporarily diverted by false ambitions in the Far East. As he has been all his life a Slavophile, it is hardly necessary to add that in his opinion her true field of activity is in South-Eastern Europe :—

Russia, as the paramount Slav and Eastern-Orthodox Power, cannot remain indifferent to the fate of more than 20 millions of Austrian Slavs, among whom about four millions profess the Eastern Orthodox faith! And the Balkan Slavs, and the Greek Orthodox East! Is there that our moral interests and our work lie.

At present there is no danger of Russia's undertaking a Pan-Slavonic crusade or an aggressive campaign of any kind; but when she has recovered from her present exhaustion, overcome her internal troubles, and reorganized her military and naval forces, she will doubtless begin to look again beyond her frontiers. If the Government should then feel the need of popular support for aggressive action it would be more likely to find it by advancing on Constantinople under the banner of Slav Emancipation than by trying to recover Port Arthur and dominate the Pacific. It is idle, however, to speculate on such distant contingencies, all the more as it is impossible to foresee whether, when that time comes, the foreign policy of Russia will be in the hands of an autocratic or of a constitutional Government.

It has been distinctly understood in the Far East that Russia's political activity in that part of the world received an almost crushing set-back from the war, and indeed the conviction was explicitly stated in these columns when news of the Portsmouth Treaty first came to hand. Neither at that time, however, nor yet when General Kireyef wrote in the Novoye Vremya, had Japan taken definite action in Korea as she did on the 17th of November. By that action she effectually closed, in our opinion, the last outlet for Russia's ambition in the direction of Far Eastern Asia. So long as Seoul remained an unrestricted field for the exercise of intrigue, just so long would the potentialities of Russia's vicinity to the north-eastern frontier of Korea have been perilous. But Seoul has now been segregated from such essays, and it is in truth hard to discover any avenue along which Russia could advance to the recovery, or attempted recovery, of her short-lived position on the Pacific. The notable feature of General Kireyef's article is that he denies a hitherto axiomatic proposition, namely, Russia's imperative need of an ice-free port in the East, or, indeed, anywhere. All her previous aggressions have been declared justifiable on that ground, and yet, as the writer in the Novoye Vremya seems to demonstrate clearly, no such need really exists now, whatever may be the case hereafter.

THE UNIVERSITY QUESTION.

It seems that the University question will be settled by the resignation of Mr. Kubota, Minister of Education, and possibly by the resignations of some of the professors. Count Katsura, when receiving the Deputation sent by the Faculty, was careful to explain that the Minister's resignation is not to be interpreted as bearing upon the rights or wrongs of the matter in dispute, but as merely an expression of regret that such a commotion should have occurred in the great seat of learning while he was responsible for the direction of educational affairs. His Excellency hinted very plainly to the Deputation that a more circumspect line of conduct might be advantageously followed by the leaders of the student classes.

If Mr. Kubota's resignation be accepted, it is thought that Admiral Yamamoto may undertake his duties in conjunction with those of the Naval Department.

The Faculty of the Imperial University are not appeased by the resignation of the Minister of Education. Some of them think that step sufficient, but the great majority insist that President Yamakawa must be reinstated and Professor Tomizu restored to his chair. It appears to us that the Faculty are asking too much. They want to accomplish a radical change by one stroke of the pen whereas more deliberate methods would become them better and would be more likely to win public sympathy. The resignation of the Minister of Education would be interpreted as a victory for the Faculty, and they might well be content with such a success by way of an installment of what they desire to accomplish ultimately.

DOMESTIC POLITICS.

The new political party has become an accomplished fact. It only lacks a name. Fifty-five members of the Diet now in Tokyo have inscribed their names on the roll, and 33 if not 35 others are confidently counted on. Thus the party will command at least 88 votes. Its composition is as follows :—

Old Liberals	12
Imperialists	18
Unaffiliated	25
Koshin Club	20
Yushi-kai and Konwa-kai	13

Total

Among the names of the promoters we observe those of Messrs. Fukuchi Genichiro, Sasa Tomofusa, Takanashi Tetsushiro, Inouye Kakugoro, Okada Iiyebu and Ishizuka Juhei. They declare that the minority in the House of Representatives is completely ignored by the two great parties and that the time has come when its members must assert themselves.

CAPTAIN GUNJI.

Captain Gunji says that the first news he received of the outbreak of the Russo-Japanese war was from the Toba Maru, a little steamer which reached Shumushu at the end of May. He learned from the same vessel that 14 or 15 Japanese schooners were in the Kamchatka waters. It seemed evident that if, as was highly probable, provisions should run short in Kamchatka in the course of the war, a raid might at any moment be made by the Russian inhabitants against Shumushu, for the purpose of obtaining provisions. Captain Gunji consequently deemed it expedient, in the interests of self-defence, to make a reconnoitering expedition and he accordingly set out in the Toba Maru. He did not fall in with any one of the schooners said to be in these waters, and he finally decided that it would be necessary to land if any information was to be obtained. The procedure naturally involved danger, but that seemed inevitable. He went ashore at Ozelonai and instituted inquiries in the direction of Yamina. After a time a man came bearing a letter. The letter was from a United States citizen named "Carson" (?), not altogether unknown to Gunji. The superscription was merely "the master of the Japanese ship," and its contents were that much scarcity of provisions existed at Petropavlosk and that if the Japanese could furnish a supply they would be well paid. Captain Gunji thought that the arrival of the Russian bearing the letter might be a good opportunity for obtaining information, but as nothing could be got out of the man, who proved either obtuse or obdurate, Gunji finally asked for an interview with the local headman, and the latter came the following day. From him also the same story was heard; namely, that great scarcity of provisions existed, that there was much sickness owing to the long-continued rain, and that no physician being procurable the people were in much distress. The headman begged Captain Gunji to send assistance, and he, deeming it a good occasion for obtaining information, took Dr. Oda with two interpreters, Okano and Sawada, and proceeded to the village. Sawada was the first to detect that things were not as pacific as they seemed, and after a time the little party became aware that they were surrounded on all sides by men several of whom bore arms. Gunji then recognised that he had fallen into a trap, but to retreat being out of the question, he continued the journey. Presently a messenger came and told them to proceed to Petropavlosk. He refused to give any information and further insisted that the visitors must proceed singly. Thus Gunji became separated from Oda and the interpreters and did not again see them. He himself was conducted to a room under the light-house and there confined. This occurred in the middle of August and he was kept there until the end of November suffering much from bad provisions. Falling sick, he was taken to hospital where he found a fellow-countryman who had become naturalized in Russia. From this man he received much assistance and learned also that Dr. Oda was in a neighbouring village. In December, the people of Petropavlosk, being dissatisfied with their physician, applied for the services of Dr. Oda, and he was conducted to the place in February, taking over the duties of the hospital. Then first Gunji obtained access to newspapers and learned the course of the war. In April the Russians, evidently fearing an attempt on Gunji's part to escape, carried him to Mirkowa, a remote place in the hills. He seems to have been treated tolerably kindly but he fell ill again, and on applying for medical aid he received a letter from Lioff (?) the headman of Mirkowa, telling of the destruction of the Baltic Squadron and the coming of Japanese war-vessels to Petropavlosk and inviting Gunji to come to Korea (?) where the writer was. Gunji at once complied, and then learned from American newspapers that peace negotiations had commenced. He also received a letter from Rear-Admiral Togo. Lioff seemed unwilling to hand over this letter through desirous of hearing its contents, but it proved to be merely a statement that the Baltic Fleet had been destroyed and that Shumushu was safe. Thenceforth Gunji's treatment became much kinder. He subsequently found that when Rear-Admiral Togo's squadron visited Petropavlosk, they made inquiries at the light-house for Gunji, and learning that he was at Mirkowa, forwarded the above letter to him. Subsequently Gunji was sent to Vladivostock, where he arrived in the middle of the insurrection, and was shortly afterwards allowed to return to Japan. It is a commonplace story and we translate it mainly because of the mystery attending Captain Gunji's appearance and the many conflicting rumours circulated at the time. Captain Gunji alleges that he has not to this day the slightest idea why he was taken prisoner and held such a long time in Russian dominions. He says nothing whatever of the acts attributed to him by Russian official reports, namely, the hoisting of the Japanese flag and the proclamation of annexation.

A REMARKABLE MALEFACTOR.

The Tokyo Local Court has just remanded for public trial a man called Noguchi Osaburo, who though only 26 years of age has a remarkable record. He had succeeded in gaining admittance to the family of a celebrated poet, Noguchi Neisai, who was a leper, and he married the latter's younger sister, Soye. Some months ago Osaburo and Soye were arrested on a charge of poisoning Neisai. The woman has now been released, no case having been proved against her, but the man will be tried on several counts. It appears as though his life for several years had been guided by a fixed purpose. Taking up his residence in the vicinity of Neisai's house, he applied himself to win popularity by kindness to women and children, a performance in which he exhibited extraordinary skill, and finally he became intimate with Neisai's sister and won her heart, thereafter making his way into the household where he performed all his duties with the greatest assiduity. Neisai however, never fully trusted him. At this time Neisai's malady developed serious symptoms and Osaburo nursed him with the utmost care, hoping to benefit himself by discovering some method of curing and preventing the fell disease. The patient took note of this constant nursing and thanked him warmly. It appears that Osaburo had heard a popular legend to the effect that a decoction of human flesh would not only heal leprosy but also avert it, and his faith in the nostrum was confirmed by a book which he read in the spring of 1902 and which contained the recipe. Thinking therefore, to cure Neisai and to protect the latter's sister, he proceeded to Niban-cho in the Kojimachi ward of Tokyo at 9 p.m. on the 27th of March, 1902, and seizing a boy of eleven who was performing an errand, pressed his face against his own breast so as to stifle all outcry and then choked him, thereafter taking him into an alley and severing his jugular. Then having cut from the body a piece of flesh 6 inches by 4½, he hired a boat on the following day, and, rowing out to the neighbourhood of the Shiba Detached Palace, boiled down the piece of flesh, pouring the juice into a bottle. On his return he purchased at Akasaka some chicken broth which he mixed with the contents of the bottle, and gave some of the concoction to Neisai and Soye. Previously to these doings he had been a student in a school of languages, but failing again and again to pass his examinations, he was finally expelled. He contrived nevertheless to forge a certificate of graduation and to counterfeit the official seal, so that he passed for a successful scholar. He did not, however, succeed in persuading Neisai to give him his sister for wife, though in secret they lived as a married couple, and thus in July of 1904 the woman became enceinte. She threatened to drown herself rather than endure the disgrace, and finally she left her brother's house in company with her lover. Neisai's relatives then decided that the only course was to sanction marriage between the two, and thus the man became muko-yoshi in Neisai's family and took the name of Noguchi. It had been the poet's intention to bequeath all his property to his sister, but her immoral conduct induced him to change his purpose. He decided to leave her a portion only and finally to establish her in a separate house. In the meanwhile, however, she was to remain with her brother, who insisted that Osaburo should do something to re-establish his character, either by joining the army as an interpreter or engaging in some trade. This led to disputes, the issue of which was that Osaburo threw off his mask and demanded to be released from his connexion with the family, with which demand Neisai complied. But Osaburo, having no means of livelihood, would fain have re-entered the family. Neisai, however, now knowing him to be a bad character, refused to admit him and Osaburo made up his mind that nothing remained but to kill Neisai. His first attempt was by means of strychnine which Soye was to have unwillingly administered, but this device failing, he resorted to a surer method. Stealthily entering Neisai's house at 1 a.m. on the 12th of May, 1905, he strangled the sick man, an easy victim as his hands and feet were powerless from his malady. The murderer arranged matters so as to suggest that the crime had been committed by burglars. He now had to devise some plan of ingratiating himself with the dead man's relatives, and the best device seemed to be compliance with the wish expressed by Neisai—joining the army as an interpreter. His linguistic acquirements being, however, quite inadequate, he resolved to absent himself from Tokyo under pretence of military service. But money was essential and to obtain it he committed his last crime. Simulating acquaintance with an officer who had returned from Manchuria in possession of a quantity of gold bullion which might be bought cheap, he persuaded a Kojimachi druggist, Tsuzuki Tomigoro, to accompany him to the officer's place. The druggist took in his purse a sum of 350 yen. As the two were passing through a wood in Yoyohata-mura, Osaburo seized the druggist, strangled him, purloined his money, and then tied round his neck a broken rope, part of which he attached to a tree so as to suggest that the man had hung himself and that the rope had broken. It is not stated why suspicion attached to Osaburo, but presumably the fact that he had been last seen in the druggist's company gave a clue to the police. He is thus to be publicly tried for three murders, a robbery with violence, and forgery of official documents. It will be remembered that when the body of the little boy, Kaai Sosuke, was found, the throat cut and the corpse mutilated, much horror and excitement were caused, and shrewd suspicions were expressed that the flesh had been removed by some ignorant person who had faith in old-fashioned nostrums.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

According to Russian reports the number of Japanese prisoners is somewhat larger than was supposed; namely:—

Naval officers.....	3
Army ".....	31
Men having the relative rank of officers (i.e. non-combatant officers).....	56
Blue-jackets.....	87
Soldiers.....	1,310
Men ranking as soldiers (? non-combatants).....	273

Total 1,760

Besides these there are 217 in Harbin, an unknown number in the Russian field-hospitals, and about 158 in the hands of the Amur forces which fought in north-eastern Korea.

It is announced that a cable has been laid between Hokkaido and Saghalien. The line starts from Nosawa Cape on the north of Yezo, is carried thence to Todo-shima, proceeds thence to Alexandrofski on the west coast of Saghalien, and from the island of Todo to Korsakoff.

The Kaiser's horses, six in number, which His Majesty sends to the Mikado, reached Nagasaki by the steamer Prins Eitel Friedrich in good condition. They are said to be most beautiful animals, which may well be supposed. Doubtless they were chosen with care worthy of their great donor and their great recipient.

A telegram published by the Foreign Office announces that there arrived at Nagasaki on the 11th instant in the German Mail Prins Eitel Friedrich from Bremen 8 Japanese tradesmen made prisoners at the time of the sinking of the Kinshu Maru, and 3 made prisoners at Anju (in Korea). The simple announcement is very significant. The Kinshu Maru was sunk by the Russians in the month of April, 1904. Hence these 11 tradesmen were kept in custody for 18 months. Anju ceased to be occupied by Russian troops on May 1st, 1904. Hence the 3 merchants captured there must have fallen into Russian hands before that date, and were consequently kept 18 months in confinement. These are not the only instances of the seizure and detention of non-combatant Japanese subjects by the Russians during the war; many other examples are on record and have been reported from time to time in our columns. What justification can there be for such procedure? If there be such a thing as civilized warfare, one of its fundamental principles should be the immunity of non-combatants. It may be urged, perhaps, that this rule has not yet been included in the recognised statutes of warfare. The answer is that it received strict obedience at the hands of the Japanese at any rate. The Japanese refrained as far as possible from capturing non-combatants, and when any such fell into their hands unavoidably, they lost no time in setting them free. We have only to recall the case of Port Arthur where this principle was strictly respected. We should like to hear from the Russians an explanation of their conduct in this matter. There must be some explanation.

At half past twelve on Thursday Count Katsura was appointed to act temporarily as Minister of Education, Mr. Kubota being relieved of his post at his own request.

Mr. Hamawo, formerly President of Minister of the Imperial University, has been re-appointed to that post.

The death is recorded to-day of Sir John Walsham, Bart., K.C.M.G. D.L., late British Minister at Peking. The deceased baronet was born at Cheltenham on Oct. 29, 1830, being the eldest son of Sir John James Walsham, the first baronet, whom he succeeded in 1874. "Men and Women of the Time" says:—

He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A., and was for some time employed in the Audit Office, but was appointed to a clerkship in the Foreign Office in 1854. He was made Acting Consul in Mexico in 1859, Secretary of Legation in 1861, and Chargé d'Affaires in 1863. In 1866 he was transferred as Second Secretary to Madrid; was appointed to the Hague in 1870, and promoted to be Secretary of Legation in Peking, October 1873, but did not proceed. From 1875 to 1878 he was Acting Chargé d'Affaires in Madrid, and then went to Berlin as Secretary of Embassy. In 1883 he was transferred to Paris, and acted as Minister Plenipotentiary during the absence of the ambassador. From November 1885 to April 1892 he was Envoy to China, and also to the King of Korea, but in the latter year was transferred to Bucharest. He retired on a pension in 1894. C.M.G., February 1895; K.C.M.G., 1895. He married, in 1867, Florence, only daughter of the Hon. P. Campbell Scarlett, C.B.

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

The principal feature of the fortnightly meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society, held on Friday evening in Van Schaick Hall, was a thoughtful and exceedingly pleasant essay entitled "The 18th Century in England," which, in the absence of its author, Mr. Thomas Satchell, was read by the President Mr. Satchell in opening, said he intended dealing more particularly with the literary side of the 18th century while also giving some slight attention to its social aspects. He reminded his hearers that a nation's development does not take place in a straight line; the movement was wave-like. In this respect, therefore, the 18th century wave in England did not reach so high as its predecessor, the Elizabethan. "It certainly did not reach so high from the point of view of poetry and the drama, which, in spite of notable exceptions, were then at its lowest ebb. On other sides it was more brilliant, however, and there is much we owe to it that we would not be willing to forget." Having given some indications of the space of time which the title of his lecture really covered and the men who appeared upon its stage, Mr. Satchell proceeded:—"The 19th century was very given to look down upon the 18th as a period of spiritual dullness. Many disciples of the old school—men who thought Pope the most delightful of poets and Dr. Johnson the wisest of men—survived well into the 19th century, but in spite of their guidance the younger generation refused to accept their opinions on matters of literature and art, with the result that the estimate of the 18th century was rather unduly lowered. In dwelling on its failures there was a tendency to lose sight of its successes. It has always to be remembered that the period of history between the Restoration of the Stuarts and the French Revolution was one of great political unrest and activity. During how many of those 130 odd years England was at war I should be sorry to say; certainly it was for a good many years. There were wars with the Dutch, wars with France—continual wars with France—war with America, wars in India—terrible wars in which countless treasure was wasted. I am not saying that those wars were altogether England's fault; she was perhaps more sinned against than sinning, especially in the wars with France. But it was natural that the part she played in the history of Europe during that period should have left her exhausted in other activities. Not once or twice during those struggles England was left in an exhausted condition—a condition from which her enemies, and even her friends, thought she would never rally. That she disappointed them certainly seems a marvel when we look back upon the history of the time, and she undoubtedly did it at a great sacrifice—the sacrifice of her spiritual life." The lecturer proceeded to establish his thesis with quotations from 18th century writers, drawing upon Richardson, Smollett, Goldsmith, Fielding, Fanny Burney, etc., and the picture drawn was certainly most sombre, particularly on its social side, though the extracts also proved that the age was one of courtly manners, grace and polish—above all "polish, polish everywhere, in literature, art, music, manners—polish to such an extent that the whole state of society can only be described as artificial." Mr. Satchell then passed on to a brief review of some of the leading lights of the 17th century—Burke, Fielding, Dean Swift, Garrick, Smollett, Richardson, Chatterton, Fanny Burney, Dr. Johnson,—pointing out in some cases their successes and their failures, their triumphs and their disappointments, as well as the works by which posterity is glad to remember them. The lecture concluded in these words:—"I should like in closing to refer to a matter which has often occurred to me—that is whether society in England will ever return to the state of artificiality which distinguished it in the Eighteenth Century. If we are not so very much better than our forefathers we can at least claim with some show of reason that we are more natural. We no longer despise our own hair and think to cover it with a wig, and yet it will be remembered that there was an antecedent time when man was as natural as he is to-day. If then he found it necessary to alter the fashion in which he was made, why should he not do so again. It seems impossible for us to believe that we can ever abandon the naturalness which we have so long cultivated; but in the history of mankind nothing is impossible. The passion for cards, which played so large a part in the amusements of the 18th century, is already growing upon us again. If we can thus return to earlier forms of amusement, it is not difficult to believe that we may return to earlier forms of dress. We may not go so far as to wear swords, because the use for the sword in civil life is lost; but it is not difficult to believe that men might revive that taste for brilliant coloured clothes now limited to women, and may once more aim at that artistic appearance which is certainly lacking in their present garb. The clothes of the mind may undergo the same change as those for the body. 108 years ago Burke died and 135 years ago Wordsworth was born. Both saw a revolution such as that which now appears to be looming as a thundercloud over a part of Europe. One—the latter—hailed it as the dawn of light; the other looked upon it as a portent of evil. Wordsworth lived to deny his earlier faith, shocked at the unrestrained licence which followed the loosening of the bonds. Russia now claims the attention which France claimed at the end of the 18th Century, and we can but wonder whether, as in that event, the whole of Europe will be thrown into conflict and the events of the 18th century, in inverted order, be repeated."

A hearty vote of thanks having been accorded to Mr. Satchell for his lecture, the following programme was proceeded with:—

THE IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY.

THE Professors of the Imperial University have unanimously endorsed the representation referred to in our columns yesterday, and it will be presented to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Education as soon as it has received the signatures of the Professors of the College of Agriculture who, owing to their distance from Hongo, were not direct participators in the first meeting.

This affair evidently has its roots much deeper than the incident which constitutes a proximate cause. It is an assertion by the University for a fuller measure of independence. Doubtless the fact that President YAMAKAWA, who is very popular and widely respected, was the victim of what the Faculty regard as an act of arbitrariness on the part of the Education Department, whereas Professor MATSUI, his successor, does not hold an equal place in public esteem, has been largely responsible for precipitating the disturbance. But the basic feature is that the University wants more independence; wants to obtain practical recognition of its status as an educational institution above everything else, and wants to establish the principle that its educational functions shall be paramount, and shall take precedence of any Ministerial considerations. Events have shaped themselves conveniently for the Faculty in this case. Professor TOMIZU, who was removed from his chair because of his political activity, filled a position for which no other Professor could be considered equally competent. In fact, he stood alone as a teacher of Roman Law, and his separation from the University would have caused irreparable inconvenience. Therefore President YAMAKAWA deemed it justifiable, as it certainly was expedient, to retain his services as teacher despite the fact that he had been removed from his professorial chair by the Education Department as a disciplinary measure. Public opinion will doubtless endorse the President's action in that matter, for, after all, what he had to consider before everything was the efficiency of the University as a teaching machine. Nevertheless that a man who had just been removed by order of the Minister of Education should be virtually re-instated by order of the President constituted a flagrant conflict of authority. It is true that the re-employment of Mr. TOMIZU received a kind of organic endorsement from the Minister, but no one could fail to foresee that the hitherto theoretical question of the University's pedagogic independence has now become a practical issue and must soon be openly fought out. The Minister of Education acted with deliberation. He allowed several months to elapse before taking up the gauntlet. It has been asserted that this delay is one of the chief causes of complaint, inasmuch as the Faculty of the University deem that Mr. KUBOTA acted in an underhand manner, pigeon-holing President YAMAKAWA's resignation so long as the general political situation was disturbed, and acting upon it when the Cabinet had ceased to be embarrassed by collateral issues. Our own information does not confirm that report, but rather tends to show that the Faculty have fully appreciated the imminence of a collision ever since Professor YAMAKAWA's resignation was tendered, and have only awaited the Department's final action before they openly entered the arena. It is now tolerably evident that if the Faculty stand to their guns the situation is in their hands. Most people will be disposed to think that the University should choose its own President, and probably that is the reform for which the Faculty are working. But it is not likely that any such radical change will be the immediate outcome of an open conflict between the two parties. The resignation of Mr. KUBOTA seems the most probable solution of the trouble. That would be a victory for the Faculty of the University, but a practically fruitless victory unless it prelude the larger change. We can not choose but sympathise with the University in this matter. Professor TOMIZU is scarcely to be held blameless, though it would be difficult to establish the fundamental proposition that no one occupying a chair in the University should become a political leader. Nevertheless the balance of public benefit, we believe, sways towards an independent University.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE BOXER INDEMNITY.

THERE appears to be little doubt that the United States Government, at the instance of the President, is contemplating with regard to the indemnity paid by China in connexion with the Boxer outrages a course similar to that pursued in the case of the Shimonoseki Indemnity, namely, the restoration of the money to China. Telegrams received this morning (9th instant) by the Jiji Shimpō from Peking say that the project is to subtract the expenses actually incurred by America in the campaign and to pay back the remainder, namely, 20 million yen. If that be an exact version of the plan it assumes the character of a mere act of justice, for the United States, in common with the other Western claimants, was supposed to have demanded and received only just what had actually been disbursed on account of the campaign, and if, after discharging all the bills, it be found that a surplus of 20 million yen remains, then Washington would be bound in honour to restore the sum. Neither would the discovery of a surplus be any reproach to the accuracy of the United States' financiers, for in making up such an account each claimant is bound to leave a margin for contingencies which can not possibly be fully estimated at the moment of formulating the claim. But if the restoration is to bear the interpretation of a reflection on the justice of the measures taken by the Powers in the matter of the Boxers, we can not think that Washington is well advised. That was assuredly the world's rendering of America's repayment in the case of the Shimonoseki Indemnity. The advocates of repayment made no secret whatever about the grounds of their propaganda, and it will not be denied that they had a good cause to champion. But can the Boxer outrages be included in the same category? And would it be a politic act or an act calculated to inure to the common benefit of the nations, that the United States Government should now sever itself from the association of Powers which, in 1900, stood up for the principle that no movement for the forcible expulsion of foreigners from Chinese territory will be tolerated by the Occident? It appears to us that such deliberate secession by America from the ranks of her sometime comrades would be little short of calamitous, and it further appears to us that whatever be the true motive of Washington's act, the Chinese will construe it as a belated confession of American error in 1900. It is an emotional kind of policy, unless it be purely arithmetical, and the emotions scarcely find a safe place in international relations.

CHINA'S NEW ATTITUDE.

THE Nichi Nichi's Peking correspondent writes in strong terms about the new Chinese policy of exclusion. Indifferent to the fact that she is not in a position to build her own railways, she is leaving no device untried to recover the concessions already granted. The Leih-Han line—from Canton to Hankow—has already re-passed into her hands; she is now striving to get back the concession for the road from Tsientsin to Tsinkiang and also to annul the mining privileges granted to an English syndicate in Shansi. The correspondent alleges that the boycotting of American merchandise and the Lienchow outrages were part of this movement, which he describes as very regrettable in China's best interests.

In connexion with this matter reference may be made to an impression evidently gaining ground at the Chinese ports that the newly adopted attitude of self-assertion on the part of the Middle Kingdom, is indirectly due to the education which Chinese students are receiving in Japan, and that the Tokyo Authorities should be held in some degree responsible for not checking the impulse. These are scarcely reasonable conclusions. They deliberately ignore the value of a force far more potent than either of the causes assigned, a force which has been in operation for many years—years long antedating the despatch of students to Japan—and which ought to have aroused in China long ago a sentiment precisely such as she is now displaying. It may have originally seemed harmless in her eyes that foreigners should be allowed to construct railways in her territories. She herself would enjoy the benefits of these means of communication and, after all, the lines must ultimately remain a Chinese asset. But could that estimate long survive the plain teaching of events? Was it not certain that China must ultimately come to regard railways in the light undisguisedly thrown upon them by foreign nations themselves, namely, as instruments of pure aggression? Who are mainly responsible for opening China's eyes to the real consequences of liberality in this matter? We need not undertake the invidious task of discrimination. Any moderately careful reader of recent history can easily distinguish the countries in whose hands railways have served as pretexts for posting guards and claiming rights virtually of complete possession through considerable areas on either side of the roads. That policy could not fail to awaken the Chinese sooner or later. They may have learned, probably they have learned, from Japan's example that heaven helps those who help themselves, but Japan can scarcely be held responsible for the influence thus exercised by her intrepid and efficient conduct. Chinese students had no occasion to visit Japan in order to learn the hazard of railway concessions. Object lessons of the most impressive character were presented perpetually to the Chinese nation without any action whatever on the part of the students. As for Japan, she herself is now among the applicants for concessions. She has been forced by irresistible events to occupy a position in Manchuria which compels her to become a railway owner on her neighbour's territory or to see Russia acquire the privilege in her stead. Nothing could be less convenient for Japan than the assumption of this exclusive attitude by the Middle Kingdom at precisely the moment when she is herself a suitor for concessions. But can Japan with any semblance of sincerity advise China to revert to a liberal route in such matters? Can she counsel her neighbour to ignore all the lessons of recent history and to continue a policy which is evidently suicidal? It does not follow, however, that no remedy is accessible. On the contrary, the remedy is very evident. China must modify her exclusiveness. She must differentiate her friends from her potential foes, and she must join hands with the former to develop her own resources. The solution lies there, so far as we can see—lies in combinations between Chinese nationals, Anglo-Saxon nationals and Japanese nationals. If the Peking statesmen have awakened to the danger of too much liberality, they must also have awakened to the impossibility of reverting to a purely conservative policy, and the via media between the two things is obviously a limited partnership.

News comes over the cable that Miss Alice Roosevelt is engaged to Mr. Longworth, Representative in Congress from Ohio. Mr. Longworth was one of the party who accompanied Secretary Taft and Miss Roosevelt on their Far Eastern trip.

THE BOOKSHELF.

"Nanshu Meigwa-Yen," No. 5.

THE fifth part of this interesting and beautiful publication has now appeared. We have already spoken of its scope and purpose, and we may therefore confine ourselves here to brief descriptions of the ten master-pieces reproduced in this fifth part.

1.—By Chi Chaieha of the Ming dynasty; owner Mr. Kuze Yoshinosuke. This painter, Chi, retired into complete seclusion on the fall of the Ming dynasty, and the picture before us probably represents his ideal of existence at the time when he painted it—a hermitage in a remote valley with nature only for companion. No colours are used.

2.—A drawing (in black and white) of Kwanon, by the Ming artist Chen Hsien; owner Mr. Kano Jihei. There is boldness of style and the countenance of the deity—which has no feminine element—is said to have elicited the admiration of eminent connoisseurs, but, on the whole, the study does not command much admiration.

3.—A sepiá picture by Hsu Yu of the Tsing dynasty, owned by Mr. Sumitomo Kichiyemon. The subject is a withered tree and a bamboo. The brush-work is forceful, the modelling excellent and the composition of a high order.

4.—Pine trees after rain, a sepiá painting by Kung Hsien of the Tsing dynasty; owner, Mr. Kuwana Tetsuzo. Kung Hsien was one of the "Eight Poets" of Nanking. He has succeeded in imparting to this landscape a blurred effect admirably conveying an after-rain impression.

5.—An autumn landscape by the same artist and in the same possession, with effects of misty atmosphere. These two pictures, 4 and 5, are veritable master-pieces.

6.—An autumn landscape, in sepiá by Lo Mu of the Tsing dynasty; owner, Mr. Kuwana Tetsuzo. This is scarcely of inferior merit to Kung Hsien's work as seen in Nos. 4 and 5, but an entirely different atmospheric condition is depicted. Placing 4 and 5 beside 6 and viewing them consecutively one immediately appreciates the keen perception of values that the great Chinese masters possessed.

7.—An autumn landscape; in the foreground a recluse fishing, in light colours by an unknown artist but evidently of the Tsing dynasty; the property of Mr. Takamatsu Chozayemon. This is a fine composition and the aerial perspective is excellent, but to western eyes the defective linear perspective deprives the picture of its charm.

8.—"The rustling of pines and the rippling of water." A sepiá drawing by Chen Tsungching of the Tsing dynasty; the property of Mr. Yamazoe Naonjiro. In this picture the artist has wonderfully succeeded in producing the effects signified by the title. Chen Tsungching was one of the great artists of that period so notably prolific of masters in every branch of art, the Kanghsi era. If there be anything to criticise it is the want of centralization, a defect common to the great majority of Chinese pictures.

9.—This is by a Japanese artist, Tanomura Chikuden. It is in light colour, and its owner is Mr. Mitsumura Riso. The title is Unsen-dake (peak of clouds and streams), and tradition says that the painter did not make any attempt at composition but just depicted the scenery as it presented itself to his eyes. The result does not offer any striking features though the hand of a master is easily discernible.

10.—A sepiá drawing by the Japanese artist Okada Hanko, made in the year 1812, and now owned by Mr. Mitsumura Riso. A striking example of the fidelity shown by some Japanese artists in reproducing the characteristics of the Chinese Nanshu School.

It seems a pity that these most instructive and interesting publications should be without an English or a French text. Much of their value depends on a clear understanding of the subjects depicted and of the era as well as the nationality of the artists, all of which information is hidden from ordinary readers by the ideographic script. The volumes offer to students of Oriental pictorial art a unique opportunity of tracing the connexion between the Chinese and Japanese schools, and of learning to appreciate the beauties of both.

"The Nightless City," by J. E. de BECKER, Publishers, Messrs. Max Nössler & Co. Printed by "The Box of Curios Printing and Publishing Company," Yokohama. Price 12 yen.

A SECOND edition of this remarkable book has appeared. It seems to be much fuller than the original edition, and is profusely illustrated with pretty and instructive plates, some coloured, some in black and white. A very cursory examination shows that the author must have worked with great industry and earnestness to collect such a mass of information. Mr. de Becker is an accomplished Japanese scholar, without which equipment he could hardly have brought together and certainly could not have correctly interpreted all the voluminous materials needed for this work. The subject is highly unsavoury. Few, very few, writers would deliberately make choice of it. But Mr. de Becker's view, as may be gathered from his preface, is that Japan, a country boasting a most refined and advanced form of civilization, struck out a method of her own for dealing with that perennially present problem, the social evil, and that her method deserves the careful study of every custodian of morality. This theory requires that the method should be fully investigated in order to obtain a clear conception of all its uses as well as its abuses, and, as may easily be supposed, there result a great many details which only an extreme anti-Grundian can digest without a grimace. Nevertheless there is always this recourse, that those who object can refrain from purchasing the book. Readers of a newspaper, however, have not quite the same freedom of choice and we are therefore restrained from reviewing the work at any length in these columns. Frankly speaking, our own opinion is that to devote such a bulky and expensive volume to such a theme shows a certain lack of the sense of proportion, and is further calculated to mislead the foreign public into forming an exaggerated estimate of the dimensions of the social evil in Japan. We also think that the whole matter might be more fitly dealt with in a blue-book or some official publication than in a volume which has been rendered attractive to the general public by all devices possible to the printer, the illustrator and the binder. Mr. de Becker will probably reply, however, that his object is to appeal to public opinion rather than to mere statisticians and readers of blue books, and since the public demand has seemed to warrant the great cost of bringing out a second edition—for it has evidently been very costly—we must assume that the public approve of the enterprise. While precluded from entering into any detailed analysis of the work, we may mention that it contains much interesting information about fashions in costume and about superstitious customs.

"The Spirit of Japan," by Dr. STURGE Tokyo, the Yurakusha.

THE above is the title of a charming little volume of poems composed by Dr. Sturge and collected and published by Mr. Abiko Teijiro the enterprising manager of the English department of the Yurakusha, a comparatively new but very flourishing publishing company. The work contains three English prefaces from the pens of Count Okuma, Mr. Ozaki Yukio and Mr. Tokutomi Iichiro, which all speak very highly of Dr. Sturge's benevolent work among Japanese in America and of his keen literary appreciation of all that is good and beautiful in this country. Commenting on Dr. Sturge's fascination with Japan, Mr. Tokutomi says:—"Whether he understood Japan so well by reason of having first loved her, or whether it is that he loved Japan because he so well understood her, I do not know. Perhaps his love and understanding of Japan developed side by side, the one aiding the other's growth." Dr. Sturge compares his volume of poems to the Kameido lake which reflects the magnificent purple clusters of the wistaria when it is in bloom. "This volume," he says, is simply a quiet port, reflecting something of the beauty of old Japan, typified by the ancient but lovely wistaria." The book contains 23 tastefully executed illustrations and its general get-up leaves nothing to be desired. It is divided into five parts, Part I. bearing the title of the Spirit of Japan, Part II. Japanese Legends and Historical Events; Part III. Japanese Favourite Flowers, Trees and Birds; Part IV. Japanese Scenery; Part V. Humorous Poems. Dr. Sturge's poetry is characterized by great simplicity of language combined with beauty of thought. Here is a short poem on Nature Worship.

The Shinto gods are deities
Of nature; this is why
The Japanese who worship these Have reverence for the sky
And hills and valleys, wood and sea,
Which thrills their souls with poetry.
All nature to the Japanese
In sacred language speaks,
Through lakes and flowers, birds and trees
And lofty mountain peaks;
So those who gaze on Fuji's crest
Have thoughts that cannot be expressed.

In one or two cases the versions of Japanese stories which Dr. Sturge make the subjects of poems differ from those most widely known. Such is the Quid pro Quo on p. 84. The story is that of the man who paid for the odour of eels with the sight of money as given by Mitford. But Dr. Sturge makes him pay for smell with sound by throwing down his money with a crash. We can confidently recommend "The Spirit of Japan" as a marvel of cheapness at 1 yen a copy. It deserves a wide circulation, for many of the poems reach a very high standard.

"Paradise Lost" IN JAPANESE.

The Yurakusha has just issued a translation with copious notes of Book I. of Milton's "Paradise Lost." The work seems to have been prepared with great care by Mr. Uchimura Tatsusaburo. The poem has been broken up into short passages. These are rendered into Japanese prose pretty freely, being followed by a number of notes explaining the numerous geographical, historical and mythological allusions which abound in Milton's poems. In a preface covering some 11 pages Mr. Uchimura discusses the eminent place occupied by Milton in English literature and gives an account of the peculiarities of the age in which he lived. At the end of the book is a vocabulary containing renderings of all the words used by Milton and giving the numbers of the lines in which they are found. The work sells at 35 sen a copy.

"The Cosmopolitan."

Our lively contemporary, The Cosmopolitan, is again in his November number engaged in the apparently congenial business of enlightening some people, entertaining others and shocking several at the least. To the first class certainly belong those who will read his translation from the Danish of Tolstoi's "The One Thing Needful," which contrasts very strongly with the rest of the magazine. There are articles on sport,—the "Shorrock Cup Competition, the autumn training season (an account of the races had to be held over), a short dissertation insisting on the necessity of auctioneers' decisions at race lotteries being irrevocable, a recipe for cooking spinach, a short notice of the production of "Beauty and the Barge" by the Shanghai A.D.C., a continued account of "How I became a griffin," and a great deal of other matter of mixed local interest. We observe that some one has called the Editor's attention to the inordinate use of "cuss-words" in his pages. He retorts with airy candour that their employment is necessary to correctly depict the local language of Shanghai as it is rendered by the youthful element. He adds that the majority of these young fellows "are from the continent, who think it is smart to interlard their conversation with oaths which only the lower and uneducated class of Britishers employ." With proper deference to our contemporary's superior sources of knowledge, the above is a statement which we find very hard to credit.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT IN YOKOHAMA.

The popular orchestral concert given in the Public Hall, Yokohama, on Saturday evening by the orchestra which Mr. Junker has been training at the Ueno Academy of Music for some years past drew a crowded house. Punctually at the time stated—8.45 o'clock—Professor August Junker raised his bâton and proceedings began but despite the fact that all particulars regarding the concert had been widely advertised during the past fortnight and that special note was made on Saturday morning in at least one of the local journals reminding patrons of the time of starting, only about half of the seatholders were then in their places. Consequently more than two-thirds of the overture—Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis"—was marred by the shuffling and stamping of feet and the rustle and frou frou of dresses as late-comers sought their seats in all parts of the house. The effect on the nerves of the audience who had respected les convenances and arrived in time was irritating in the extreme; as for the members of the orchestra it must have been truly exasperating. Punctuality is the courtesy of great kings—to slightly alter the well-known Baconian axiom—; punctuality should and could be the prized possession of lowlier folks. In Yokohama it seems so precious a quality as to have become a curious rarity.

Some years have fled since the last orchestral concert of any distinction was given in Yokohama and there can be little doubt that the present concert was keenly anticipated. On the whole Mr. Junker is to be congratulated on the work accomplished during the evening. Perhaps the brass parts were at times a little too insistent—more stringed instruments would have been very acceptable—but this slight lack of balance may no doubt be attributed to unforeseen accidents preventing the whole Ueno orchestra from being present, for although 55 performers were promised we counted but 46 on the stage at the time; while some of the pieces only brought out 36 performers. The limitations of the Public Hall platform, too, prevented the orchestra from being arranged on strictly orthodox lines, and this must be taken into account in judging of the general effect. The orchestra included, by the way, Miss H. Page and Mr. H. A. Poole, violins; Mr. E. C. Davis and Mr. Rudolph Schmidt, cellos; and Professor Heydrich, harmonium. Of all the items in Saturday's very diversified programme, Hadyn's "Serenade," played by the strings alone; Ries' "Perpetuum Mobile," rendered divinely by Miss Ko Koda and rapturously encored; and the "Lohengrin" Prelude stand out pre-eminent. The audience applauded all and demanded repeats, but very wisely the performers contented themselves with bowing their thanks. The encore fiend has had too long a run in Yokohama. For the life of us we cannot quite understand why musicians and singers should be expected, just because their performances may gratify the ears and satisfy the taste of their audience, to either repeat an item or else give something in its stead. Thank the singer and the musician right heartily by all means; but be content with what has been given and not thoughtlessly demand a further drain on emotional, mental and physical powers already exerted to their utmost limit. We know it pleases some natures to respond to encores no matter how many, but for others they form a sore tax and grievous burden hardly to be borne.

It may be noted, incidentally, that Mr. Junker chose Wagner's arrangement of Gluck's famous overture. As Prof. Heydrich told his readers in some illuminative notes appended to the programme, this overture in its original form has no ending, but leads right into the opening chorus of the opera. Mozart, adapting it for concert use, wrote an ending which was used for years, but we think that Wagner's arrangement is the better of the two, and that Professor Junker is thoroughly justified of his selection. The Mozart Concerto in the first part received an addition from the pen of Prof. Heydrich, a Cadenza which was most happily conceived and brilliantly executed, and he deserved the applause which greeted him at the close. Mrs. W. T. Payne's scena was a fine bit of dramatic declamation, suffused with deep emotion. Seldom has she been heard to greater artistic advantage. With regard to Miss Ko Koda's violin soli much might be written; they were marvellously executed and on a level of high passionate feeling seldom attained on concert platforms.

The second part of the programme, as will be seen below, was wholly orchestral. It opened with Chopin's "March funèbre," last heard in the Public Hall on the occasion of Queen Victoria's funeral service, when it was given by the Admiralty Band of Yokosuka. The orchestra attacked it boldly, but here and there discovered weaknesses which time and further practice will no doubt eliminate. In the more dramatic passages they kept splendidly together, but the wailing interludes were scrappy in execution and faulty in timing. Of the Lohengrin Prelude we have already spoken. Some critics who have heard it in Wagner's own stronghold—Bayreuth—may have been disappointed at the interpretation: it was not, to their thinking, what the Master intended, nor what he would have allowed; but to the ordinary hearer who had not had this privilege the Prelude was a beautiful piece of orchestration very expressively executed. The three dances from "Henry VIII" went with a decided swing, but to our mind the second one—the Shepherds' Dance—was too roughly handled at times; it is far too fairy-like in texture to stand aught but strings. The closing item, a valse by Strauss, might with advantage have been left off the programme: despite its obvious merits it sounded thin, monotonous and tinkling after what had gone before.

TRAGEDIES IN YOKOHAMA.

One murder and one attempt at murder took place in Yokohama on Dec. 10th. A sendo named M. Nakamura in employment on a coal lighter, murdered his wife, Haru, in their house at Yoshihama-cho, inflicting injuries on her throat with a knife while she was asleep. The man gave himself up to the Kotobuki-cho police station. Poverty was the cause. Another sendo, Y. Kaneko by name, attempted to murder his wife by stabbing her in the breast with a large fish-knife on a lighter at Kaigan-dori, Gochome, near the Yokohama District Court. He is still at large. There is no definite report as to the cause.

The dead body of a young Chinese woman was found at 6 a.m. on Monday, Dec. 12th, in the canal near the Nishi Bridge and the corner of the Yokohama Engine and Ironworks, No. 163. She was identified as Lin Kangsu (19) the wife of a Chinese merchant named Loshu-Tuck, residing at No. 129, Yamashita-cho. It is believed that she had committed suicide, about four hours previously. According to her husband she had been suffering from brain trouble for some days past. No other cause can be assigned for the act.

THE AMERICAN SOCIETY.

The tenth ordinary social meeting of the American Society was held at 6 p.m. on Dec. 12th in the Hotel de Paris, No. 179, Yokohama.

Dr. Jones, American Consul to Dairen, Mr. H. B. Miller, Consul-General, Yokohama, Mr. G. H. Seidmore, the law-adviser to the American Legation, Mr. D. H. Blake, of the American Trading Company, and sixteen Japanese notables, including Mr. Y. Nomura, proprietor of the Samurai Shokai, Mr. N. Hiranuma, and Mr. J. Yamada, a lawyer, were present.

Mr. T. Sato gave a speech of welcome on behalf of the members of the society to Dr. Jones who is on his way to Liao-tung.

This gentleman duly replied after which other guests delivered speeches. The party dispersed a little before midnight.

THROUGH THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

"Didst Thou observe Thy promise, Nazarene, That last and solemn troth which Thou didst plight

With Thy disciples who to all the world
Should bear Thy message of the Holy Rood,
Thy pledge and covenant that at every time
And in all places Thou wouldst walk with them,
Unto the age's end? Wast Thou with them
That cruel yesterday in Lienchow?
Didst Thou behold them, angels of Thy Word,
Exiles for Thine and for Thy Gospel's sake,
Die so hard death to make a jackals' feast,
Prey to the pitiless fangs of ravening wolves?
When the wild-oxen gored them, when the dogs
Swarming from all their filthy kennels forth
Tore off their raiment, and with frothing jaws
Defiled their Christian bodies: wast Thou by?
When brought to bay they bowed in shame and tears

And bitterest agony of flesh and soul,
Where were Thy footsteps? Didst Thou feed
Thy flock

Amid the lilies by the water brooks,
Unheeding that Thy faithful Shulamite
Called to her Lover from the valley of death,
The darkest shadow of death? Had she not cause

To lift the cry from that red Calvary,
'Eloi! Eloi! Lama sabachthani?'

"What had they wrought to merit such despite?
Had they gone forth to pillage and to slay;
To set the torch to ancient palaces;
To sow with poison wells where cities drink?
Or had they plundered tombs of holy men,
Or made a spoil of temples? Had their lips
Reviled the heathen gods abhorred of Thee, Outrunning Thy commission? Was there one
Could say them shame for any evil thing,
For any damage to the commonweal?
Had they not wrought Thy will for all men's good?

Their feet, for Thine, had threaded reeking lanes
Of alien cities, seeking out the lost.
They said, 'They are the Shepherd's wandered ones.'

Their hands, for Thine, had healed whom others spurned,
Counting it joy to lay their palms, for Thine,
On the foul outcast, deeming him brother to Thee.
Their lips, for Thee, o'ercame the alien speech,
That they, for Thine, might voice Thy words of life

Which mend the sorrows and the sins of men,
Adding their intercession unto Thine
For all forewandered ones, and those accursed
Of their own souls, that God would smile on them,
And save them from themselves who yet are His.
Their hearts had lowly been, for Thy sweet sake.
Who wast the Meekest, to all lowly men,
And tender to the mourner, as to Thee
Who wast the Man of Sorrows. They had wept When grief asked tears, nor had they scorned to share

The homely joys of men obscure and mean,
Brothers to Joseph's Son, the Carpenter.
Is it for this that they are done to death,
And down past death to loss of human form?
And when they perished, Master, where wast Thou?

"Nor may one count it strange that men should mete

Scorn to the lowly, to the loving hate,
A gory death to messengers of life.
For when Thou camest on Love's great mission down

To Syrian hills, and walkedst the city streets
Where men had need, to heal and comfort them,
And wast Thyself the Way and Truth and Life,
And wast the Brother and the Friend of all
To love the fallen sinner back to God,
They thought it due reward to murder Thee,
To gibbet Thee, despoiled of Thy robes,
Before the gloating mob; to rail at Thee,
And feed their eyes upon Thy shame and grief.
Ay! they were men who found a cross for Thee,
And they were men who in yon heathen town
Dealt like award unto Thy messengers.
'Tis but the garland of the Syrian thorns
Blossomed afresh in red of holy blood.

But might not mockers be excused to say,
Who saw them perish, 'Where is now their God?'

"Or speak they truth who limit Thine intent
To the white nations of the happy west
And shut Thy mercy off from half the world,
Counting but fools who for no gain of gold
Lead lives laborious under Asian skies,
Vexing the simple pagan with strange creeds?
Has then Thy pity bounds, and may it be
That all the yellow races live and die
Beyond the healing shadow of Thy Cross?
When Thou commandedst, 'Into all the world!'
Didst Thou intend a narrower world than ours?
When on that Mount of Vision Thou didst see
The kingdoms of the world, and undertake
To win them by Thy sorrow, may it be
These coasts were sunk in mists beyond Thy ken,
Beyond Thy heart's horizon and Thy hope?
Or art Thou weary of a wicked world
Which swings so slowly sunward from its night?
Or have the ages sapped Thine ancient strength?
Or has Thy covenant lapsed with lapse of years?
Hast Thou kept faith, Thou Man of Galilee?"

So spake one in a bitterness of soul
That life so fair should fall to death so foul.

"Hush, Child!" He chode, smiling thro face of tears,

"Doth not thy foolish heart instruct thy lips
To utter unwise words? For my repute
Art thou so jealous, Child, and knowest not
The word of Scripture, nor the ways of God?
For when was furnace heated sevenfold
For one of Mine, but thro its roaring flame,
Albeit unseen, there walked the Son of God?
Was I beside them, merely! Gave I not
A word of closer comfort to Mine Own?
Are thine eyes heavy when thou redest it?
When did I use to hold Mine Own so far?
Gave I not pledge to all who welcome Me
That I will be a very part of them?
Or spake not your own poets, 'Closer He Than breathing, and than hands and feet more near?'

Upon their feet I walked those Sodom streets
To bring My fallen brothers back to God.
My hands in theirs, by couch of mortal pain,
Brought solace and the healing touch of love.
Their lips were Mine that dropped with mingled myrrh

And honey for men's hurts; in thronged marts
Or in the quiet shadow of a home
That taught of the All-Father, as of old
I spake in Jewry's gates, or by the sea
At morning, when the ruddy fisher folk Drew shoreward from the fishing. Thro their hearts,

Wide with the wide compassion of the Cross,
I gave to all My pity and My love.
I lived in them and labored, and was glad
And grieved in them, and in them suffered pain,
And thro death's deepest shadow died in them.
Was I but by them, when that yelping pack Tore down their lives to death! The rabble's gibes
Found target in My heart. The brutal blows
That rained upon them spent their force on Me.
Again, as in Mine own Gethsemane,
I bowed Myself in them to shadow of death,
Holding a bitter cup that might not pass.
The blood which crimsoned them was holy blood
Of the slain Christ,

"Then say thou, 'Inasmuch
As ye have done it unto these of Mine,
Gone forth upon Mine errand, ye have done
It unto Me. Their wounding and their shame
I gather in My heart.' Such blood as theirs
Sinks not forgotten into nether earth,
But lieth red upon the during rock
And crieth to Jehovah night and day
With blood of Holy Cross, for sinful men Whose wicked hands have shed it. Those bruised lips

That bare My message, and those broken hearts
That travailed for men's souls, may pray no more
For the unlighted lives of wayward men
Who cling about the feet of the dead gods;
But that spilt blood shall plead for evermore
God's pity on them who were so pitiless,
'Father, forgive, they know not what they do.'
Where they were pilloried for all men's scorn

The sons of those who slew them shall bring wreaths

To beautify their tombs, and weep for them,
And say, 'Alas! my brother!' and 'Alas!
My sister and my mother! Woe is me
I drew my life from one who hated you
And did you so foul harm! Oh, may my love Hide from your eyes his malice!' Where they fell,

Dragged forth to death by idol worshippers,
Shall the great congregation worship God.
In Sabbaths of sweet peace shall holy bells
Summon the waiting villages to prayer.
That better Eden which God gives to earth
Shall blossom from the desert, for their sake,
In lilies and in roses. Death's red stream
And sorrow's silver rain of sweat and tears
Shall nourish healing herbs and trees of life
For earth repara'dised."

"Ay, Master, ay,
But they for tears of whom those lilies blow,
Shall they behold them? They above whose dust
The Sabbath bells shall ring shall never hear The minster's music. They whose sweat and blood
Nourish those trees of life may never walk
Beneath their scented shadow."

Then there came
A voice that fell from starry silences,
Or rose from hush of spirit's deepest deep,
As tho ONE called thro universal space,
"Blessed the dead in whom the Lord hath died,
In whom He lived, Who liveth and was dead,
Who liveth and Who dieth evermore
So long as men shall live and die in Him.
They living in Him die but to toil and tears,
They dying in Him to undreamed glories live
That shall outlast the stars."

Ah, did they lie
Naked to all men's scorn, to all men's hate,
Their piteous wounds wearing a crimson robe
For dogs to pluck at? So they fell on sleep.
For even murdered martyrs fall on sleep
That knows no sigh of sorrow. So they slept,
To waken in a white and shining world
All for their welcome keeping holiday;
And were aware of ONE more fair to see
Than ever mortal lips might shape to tell
Who stood beside them.

"Have we found such grace,
Dear Master, in Thine eyes, that Thou art come
The first to bid us greeting?"

"Nay, not so.
I passed with you the shadow gates of death,
Life's shining doors, swinging from night to day,
To bring you to your mansion and your crown,
And to the Holy Presence. Welcome home!
See! all the City holds high festival.
I never knew the streets more gaily dressed.
Come!"

And one saw them walking close with Him
In festal robes beyond the sunrise fair
And dowered with the beauty of the Lord.
And thus He led them up the smiling streets
Thronged for their Triumph, to the Sapphine Throne,
To bring them to the Presence of the King.
And all the Holy Ones who bade them hail
Said, "Blessed are the dead in whom He died!
They died, and live in Him for evermore.
From all their toils for Him they rest in Him,
And all their works for Him do follow them,
His train of shining angels, up the years."
And one who heard and saw was comforted.

SNOW AND GALES.

On the morning of Dec. 12th, snow fell at Toyama, Noto peninsula.

A Sabae telegram says that on Dec. 12th, the city was visited by snow.

Telegrams from Yamagata, Tsuyama, Fukui, etc. report snow on Dec. 13th. The cold is very severe with a bitter northerly wind.

An official telegram from Kanazawa says that on the evening of Dec. 12th, a gale was experienced in the district of Ishikawa. Some buildings collapsed and three persons were killed.

MR. MCLEAVY BROWN.

We understand (says the Seoul Press Weekly) that the members of the Imperial Customs Staff presented the following address to their highly respected Chief Commissioner just a few days before he left Korea.

"SIR:—It is the wish of the members of the Korean Customs service, a service that you have commanded with so much distinction for more than eleven years, to testify to you our appreciation of the benefits you have conferred on us by your example and teaching, and the sorrow we feel in losing a Chief whom we have always regarded with loyalty and affection.

"Your departure from Korea will be keenly felt not only by your staff but by the officials and people of this and of foreign countries who are acquainted with the valuable works that you have initiated and carried on for the benefit of Korea, under difficulties understood by none but yourself, with no reward, but the satisfaction derived from work well done.

"You have, on the eve of your departure, inaugurated an enterprise that will last forever; you have erected lighthouses on the Korean coasts; we feel confident that as these will shine as guides to mariners through fogs and shoals so will your firm and honest administration at all times act as a beacon to direct and encourage future administrators. Your work was carried on through years of stress and trouble and your name will stand out in this, the most eventful period of Korea History, as representative of all that is honest, firm and enlightened.

"To your staff in Korea the loss is personal and irreparable; we wish you a long life of happiness, and as a souvenir of the land into which you brought light and of those whose pleasure it was to serve you to the end we beg of you to accept, as a memorial of our kind wishes, a model in miniature of the first lighthouse erected on the coasts of Korea, once the Hermit Kingdom."

The above address was read to the Chief Commissioner on November 24th by Mr. Wakefield, former Commissioner of Wonsan, in the presence of Mr. Pegorini, former Commissioner of Fusan, Mr. Davidson and other members of the Customs staff. The Chief Commissioner was visibly moved and could scarcely find adequate words with which to make a suitable reply. He said, however, that what had been accomplished during his term of office was principally due to the help and assistance afforded him by all the members of his staff, from the highest to the lowest—they never failed in rendering him most faithful and valuable service.

THE PLAGUE.

Governor Sufu has issued a notification providing for proper supervision and control over persons and goods arriving in this prefecture from Kobe or Osaka, where the plague prevails.

A telegram from Zentsuji says that a case of plague has been found among the crew of a sailing vessel which arrived at Tadotsu from Osaka on Dec. 9th.

Kobe and Osaka being regarded as ports infected with plague, the Chinese authorities in Shanghai and Chefoo have decided to enforce disinfecting measures as to vessels from these places.

The plague in Osaka is assuming a serious character. On Dec. 7th between 3 and 7 p.m., seven persons died at Horiye, Dotonbori and Kizu, and post-mortem examinations showed that the deaths were caused by the disease. A doctor named Uryu, living at Kujo, Nishiku, who examined one of the patients, was affected by lung disease, in the most terrible nature.

Four fresh cases of plague were reported on Dec. 10th in the west and south urban districts of Osaka.

A fresh case of plague was reported in Osaka on Dec. 10th. The patient died. The victim was a coolie named T. Kasai.

A telegram from Kobe reports that fresh cases have appeared in the city: On Dec. 9th, seven cases; on the 10th, seven, and on the 11th, one.

An official telegram says that three cases of plague have appeared at Shimonoseki. Two of them proved fatal.

On Dec. 13th, two fresh cases were reported in Osaka, the patients being all young girls. The same day two fresh cases of plague appeared in Kobe.

FOOTBALL.

On Saturday two games of football were played on the Cricket Ground, one under Association, and the other under Rugby rules. In the former the teams were composed as follows:

COLORS.		WHITES.
J. Figueiredo	Goal	F. J. Lias (Capt.)
W. S. Moss	Backs	W. B. Mason
H. V. Irwine		A. E. Cooper

V. A. Hearne		A. W. Read
S. R. Clark		C. Thwaites
H. S. Bell		J. Drummond
O. Strome (Capt.)		E. F. Johnson

The play in this game was not of an interesting kind.

The Rugby game was watched by a large crowd of foreigners and Japanese, and previous to its commencement the teams were photographed. They lined up as follows:

KIO.		Y.C. AND A.C.
V. Kila	Back	T. Kilby
S. Miyazawa	X	B. C. Foster
H. Kaieda		D. Weed
K. Takeno	X	H. W. Kilby

M. Yamada		E. J. Moss, Jr.
Z. Otsuka		W. Graham
S. Ota		A. Kingdon
J. Kushiya		A. Talbot
Z. Hiratsuka		A. Hills

Play was opened by the home team kicking off and the first half resulted in their favour, their combination being much superior to that of the Japanese so that Hayward and H. W. Kilby were able to score two tries against them. The visitors now played more together and had their speed been equal to their passing more success must have attended their efforts. Just as the whistle went for half time they had fair prospects of scoring a try.

The foreign team assumed the aggressive in the second half, but the Japanese made a very strong defence and on two occasions were able to carry the war into the enemy's territory. After a good deal of lively play, however, the home team scored a try, which Hayward failed to convert, and later another try which Foster converted, the game thus closing in their favour by a goal and three tries to nil.

CUSTOMS PROTESTS.

Mr. K. Hashimoto, Director of the Yokohama Customs, gave a decision on December 9th on a protest by Messrs. A. Oestmann & Co. The firm imported paper with certificate of origin from Germany on which the appraisers imposed 10 per cent. ad valorem duty in accordance with clause B of No. 46 of the conventional tariff between Japan and Germany. The importers contended that the material should be dealt with under clause A of that tariff. The protest was sustained; on the ground that in nature the paper is regarded as material for printing purposes and measures more than 1086 square inches per sheet and weighs not more than 24 lbs. per ream of 500 sheets. The duty therefore should be sen 80 per 100 kin.

On the same day the director of the Yokohama Customs delivered another decision on a protest by Messrs. Heller & Co., No. 176, Yokohama. The firm, it is stated, imported flax thread for sewing purposes. The Customs authorities fixed the duty at sen 20.2 per kin under No. 353 of the tariff and the extraordinary tax at sen 15.7 per kin. The importers contested the imposition holding that the material was flax twine and that consequently it should be dealt with in accordance with No. 375 of the tariff. The protest was dismissed on the ground that the thread was not twine but was to be used for sewing purposes.

On December 9th, a further decision was given by Mr. Hashimoto rejecting a protest by M. Sato, a hard-ware trader, Sakai-cho, who imported gauge-glasses. The appraisers imposed 20 per cent. ad valorem duty under No. 172 of the tariff and 10 per cent. extraordinary tax. The contention of the appellant was that the material should be dealt with in accordance with No. 17 or No. 24 of the tariff and that they should be regarded as parts of machinery.

SHIPPING ACCIDENTS.

A telegram from Onomichi says that on the morning of Dec. 7th, the steamer Sanjo Maru (691 tons) collided with the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's chartered ship Banberg in Wafure strait. The former sank in forty minutes, but the crew were all saved by the Banberg. The sunken steamer was on her way from Sasa, Hizen province, to Osaka with coal.

The steamer Chokyu Maru (1,238 gross tons) belonging to Mr. C. Tanaka, of Tokyo, collided at 3 a.m. on Dec. 8th at Muroan with the Nippon Yusen Kaisha's steamer Salsuma Maru. The former sustained severe damage amidships.

The steamer Takatori Maru (1,869 tons) collided with the British steamer Argos (774 tons) on the evening of Dec. 8th off Shirasaki. The Japanese ship sustained damage on the bow and the foreign vessel on the port side. The damage sustained by both was so severe as to lay them up for repairs, but after undergoing temporary repairs by returning to Moji, the Takatori Maru left on the following morning for her destination.

THE LAW COURTS.

THE TOKYO DISTURBANCES.

The trial of Y. Mudaguchi (31) a policeman of the Honjo Station, who is charged with having assaulted K. Miyamoto and inflicted severe injuries on him with a sword during the disturbance on the night of Sept. 5th, began on Dec. 11th in the Tokyo District Court before Judge Hosoya and Public Procurator Aoki.

A lengthy examination was conducted. The essential point of the statement by the accused was that Miyamoto threw a stone at him while he was endeavouring to put down the rioting of some men at Aioi-cho, Honjo. The accused tried to arrest the stone-thrower and the latter opposed him. He therefore struck Miyamoto with his sword. The accused did not know what result was created by his striking the man.

A lawyer employed for the defence asked the Court for leave to examine Miyamoto as a witness. The Court decided to do so on Dec. 15th.

THE DOSHISHA.

(COMMUNICATED)

From time to time references have appeared in the Japan Mail and elsewhere which have indicated the existence of a strong opposition to the Directors (Riji) of the Doshisha, on the part of many of the alumni. It will be a great satisfaction to all friends of that institution to know that a reconciliation has been effected which promises to bring to its support the whole body of alumni and through their cordial co-operation to open a new era in its history.

The movement now happily consummated began in a meeting of the alumni of Tokyo, on the evening of October 25th, which was, however, attended by many from other cities who happened to be present and who shared in the discussions. At first much difference of opinion was manifest among the speakers and was expressed with no little vigor; but on every hand there were heard such declarations of loyalty to Dr. Neesima and his plans for the institution as to make it evident that the time had come for an earnest effort to bring the two parties together and to heal the irritation which had grown out of past differences. This was the more manifest, because of the general agreement that whoever the Directors might be their policy must be in harmony with the existing constitution of the Doshisha, certainly as regards all fundamental matters. It was also made clear that there was no wish on the part of any to terminate the present arrangement which provides for three representatives of the foreign friends of the institution on the Board of Directors,—indeed one of the leaders of the so-called opposition expressed the hope that this cooperation might continue for many years to come.

It was natural, then, for one of the oldest alumni to propose that a committee of ten persons should be appointed to consider the situation and if possible report at the next meeting of the alumni a plan for healing the present difference. This proposal was received with applause and unanimously adopted. The committee, which was selected by ballot, was made up of the following persons:—

Kazutane Ukita.	Teinosuke Murai.
Hisamitsu Furuya.	Eijiro Ono.
Tokio Yokoi.	Kosuke Tomezaka.
Isao Abe.	Danjo Ebina.
M. Ichihara.	Juzo Kono.

Very early in the negotiations it was decided that whatever changes were proposed in the Board of Directors, none should be considered which savoured of a revolution. All were agreed that the end sought should be, not the victory of one party over another, but some plan for genuine cooperation on a mutually acceptable basis. After careful thought, the committee proposed that no resignations should be asked, but that five new members should be added to the Board of Directors and that two of these should be made members of the Finance Committee. Under this arrangement the member of Directors would be twenty and of the Finance Committee five. There was a desire expressed that seven new Directors, instead of five, might be elected, but this could not be done without an amendment to the Constitution, that is, to the Charter, and it was thought better not to advise this change.

The proposal of the Committee was heartily accepted by the alumni of Tokyo, Yokohama, Kyoto, Osaka, and Kobe. A special meeting of the Directors was held in Kyoto on Dec. 7th and action was taken unanimously, in accordance with the recommendations of the committee of ten. The new Directors are, Messrs. Tsuneteru Miyagawa, Tasuku Harada, Eijiro Ono, Teinosuke Murai and Hisamitsu Furuya. The members of the Finance Committee are Messrs. Juzo Kono, Kosuke Tomezaka, Eijiro Ono, Teinosuke Murai, and D. C. Greene.

The following day, the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of the Doshisha was celebrated. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Tsuneteru Miyagawa and Hon. Tokio Yokoi, M.P., and congratulatory essays were read by representatives of the Faculty and students. An interesting feature of the occasion was the announcement that the alumni had collected yen 800 toward a prize scholarship fund of yen 1,000, in honor of the Rev. Dr. Learned's thirty years' service in the Doshisha.

The Tokyo alumni celebrated the anniversary by a dinner at the Ueno Seiyōken on Dec. 9th which passed off with much eclat.

The plan of conciliation which has been adopted involves no irritating compromises and it would appear that the causes of separation lay rather in the past than in the present, and that no radical difference of opinion as to questions of present policy exists to bar the way to most cordial cooperation. There is evident among the alumni a growing sense of responsibility for the realization of Dr. Neesima's hopes for the Doshisha and a determined purpose to discharge this responsibility to the full, which augurs a bright future.

ORGAN RECITAL AT UNION CHURCH.

The second organ recital given this season at Union Church drew a very fair congregation on Wednesday. The choir was again considerably augmented for the occasion and consisted of 40 voices. The principal number was Caleb Simper's Christmas cantata, "The Nativity of Christ," which, with its bright carols and choric interludes was very seasonable and went with a hearty swing all through. The solos were taken by Miss Lloyd Thomas (soprano), Mr. E. A. Cooper (tenor) and Mr. S. H. Somerton (bass), and all did full justice to the work entrusted to them. The choruses were again very pleasingly rendered, demonstrating the careful training which preceded the recital and the enthusiastic interest in sacred music which animates the choir. Mr. Clarence Griffin made a most capable conductor. In the second part of the programme Spohr's "As parts the hart," was sung by the full chorus, Miss Mendelson taking the solo parts and interpreting the deeply emotional theme very sympathetically and very sweetly. Mr. Vincent's contributions on the organ were:—"Marche Pontificale" (Zombelle), "The Bells" (Haberher), "Sherzoso" (Rheinberger), "Hymn of the Nuns" (Lefebure Weby) and Toccata in G. (Dubois) of which, perhaps, "The Hymn of the Nuns" with its striking motif, was most highly appreciated by his hearers. It is a pity that he has not a better instrument at command.

The next organ recital will be given about March when it is hoped that Shinn's "The Captives of Babylon" will be rendered.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Vice-Admiral Tsunoda, Commander of Takeshiki Defences, is ill. His condition is reported to be serious.

About 66,000 lbs. of Hankow tea, being part of the cargo on one of the captured ships, were recently sold at Sasebo by auction.

General Tsukamoto, Commander of the Fourth Division, and staff arrived at Kobe on Dec. 13th by the Sanuki Maru from the front.

Baron Yamamoto, Minister for the Navy, returned from Kure on Dec. 14th in company with the British Ambassador and Lady MacDonald.

Captain Smith, of the P. M. steamer Siberia committed suicide in Hongkong on December 7th. Domestic trouble is believed to have been the cause.

The launch of the Trukuba will take place on Dec. 26th. Owing to the postponement, the Crown Prince will leave Kure to-day, Dec. 15th, for Maiko on his way to Tokyo.

Miss Holland writes us from 23, Kawaguchi, Osaka:—"On account of my letter and statement of expenses reaching your office from two different points of the compass, one rather serious omission has resulted, namely, that the figures relate to the First Annual Account dating from May, 1904, to the same month of this year. In six months since then the fund has continued to do good, but the balance of course is relatively reduced."

The full title of the Rev. John Batchelor's latest work, published by the Methodist Publishing House, No. 3, Shichome, Ginza, Tokyo, is the "Ainu-English-Japanese Dictionary and Grammar."

Mr. Takahashi, Master of Shimbashi station, has been decorated by the Kaiser with the Fourth Class of the Crown. The insignia was presented on Dec. 12th by Count Arco Valley, German Minister.

Small boy, trying to make up his mind which profession he would adopt. "When I grow up, I think I shall be a soldier, or a sailor, an Archbishop or an organ-grinder." Little sister, with decision, "Be a married man like father!"

A London telegram to the Hongkong Daily Press says that the British Naval Estimates have been reduced to £31,869,000. The gross estimates for 1904-05 were £38,327,838, and the net estimates £36,880,500 so that it will be seen a very considerable reduction has been made.

Y. Nakamura, a pharmacist employed in the office of Dr. O. Kimura, Aioi-cho, Ni-chome, Yokohama, committed suicide on the morning of Dec. 13th by drinking a quantity of morphine. There is no definite report as to the cause. A post mortem examination was carried out the same day at the Isezaki-cho Police Office in the presence of judicial officials.

A dispatch to the Evening Standard from Christchurch, New Zealand, says that Lionel Terry has been sentenced to death for deliberately killing a Chinaman in the streets of Wellington. N. Z. Terry is a traveller and artist. Recently he wrote a book entitled "The Shadow of the Empire," in which he attempted to show that the danger of the British Empire lay in the influx of Chinese. At the trial Terry admitted that he had killed the Chinaman, saying he wished to test the question of whether the law really protected aliens. The jury recommended mercy on the ground that his hatred for the yellow race had crazed him.

A telegram to the Japan Advertiser says that Senator Mitchell of Oregon, who was found guilty of fraud in connection with the land exposures last July, is dead. He was 70 years old and his conviction, from which he appealed, told greatly on him and superinduced complications which resulted in his death. Another cable to the same journal says:—Among the recommendations made to Congress are two by Secretary of War Taft, one for increasing artillery ordnance and the other to increase the army and navy medical services and invest them with authority that they have not hitherto enjoyed. The latter recommendation of the Secretary has been inspired by Major E. L. Seamans, who made observations during the Russo-Japanese war and is the author of a book setting forth his conclusions in the matter.

Up to the present time, says the Scout Press Weekly, the meteorological observatories at Chemulpo, Fusan, Mokpo, Chinnampo and Gensan, Syung-Chin and Yong-Am-Po are the only ones that have been in existence in this country. As all these places are on the coast, it is now felt necessary to build observatories at various places in the interior in the interests of agriculture, so that the differences of climate may be tested. After consulting with the Medical Department of the Japanese Army Headquarters it has been decided to erect observatories at the following stations; viz, Ham-Heung, Hoi-Yung, Von-Sung, Chout-Chun, Chun-Chou, Hai-Chou, Kam-San, Chang-Chin, Fouk-Syeng, Cho-San, An-Jou, Kim-Hwa, Tai-Kou, at which exact observations will be made at 6 a.m., 2 p.m., and 10 p.m. every day.

YOKOHAMA YACHT CLUB.

The following is the report of the Committee for the Season just past, the Nineteenth of the Club's existence:—

The season of 1905 has not been remarkable for a plenitude of good sailing breezes. Commencing with the 29th April, races were scheduled for every Saturday up to the 4th November, also the 4th July, and 9th November; making a total of 30 racing days. Out of this number, on three occasions there was not enough wind to allow a start; on four occasions a start was made, but the yachts could not finish within time limits; while on six occasions races were spoilt by calms, flukes and scarcity of wind, although a finish was effected. The wind, on the remaining seventeen occasions, may be classified as follows:—

Light.....	2
Light to moderate.....	5
Moderate.....	7
Fresh.....	2

Early in the year there was promise of revived interest in the 39 Rater races by the building of a new yacht, but the new Kingfisher was only completed in time to make her first appearance in the race for the American Minister's Cup on the 4th July. Accidents, scarcity of wind, and want of tuning-up prevented her from making any show in the racing until late in the season.

The Cruising Class completed 16 races, and the prizes were fairly evenly divided amongst the competing yachts, except Wanderer, but the yawl only started in half of the completed races. At the tail end of the season a recruit for the Cruising Class made her appearance, the old Kingfisher, refitted and renamed Naniwa. Under ketch rig she rates the same as Nina, and there should be good racing between them.

The 21 Raters had a fairly good season, with races scheduled for every Saturday, alternately for the whole class with record points, and for those not entered for the M.Y.C. races, without record points. Pele once more carried off the honours, although threatened by the appearance of a new scow, Aimee. The new racer was not ready for the first race, had to be content with third place in her first attempt, then went to the front, and seemed like staying there for the rest of the season, but a break-down when leading in one of the later races deprived her of any chance of overtaking Pele in record points. An interesting race was sailed by this class for a trophy presented by A. E. Jones, Esq., the Commodore of the Shanghai Yacht Club. The conditions barred assistance from paid hands, all work from setting sail before the race to picking up moorings after crossing the finishing line being done by the amateur crews consisting of members only. Under these conditions Winsome proved the winner.

Interest in the Lark Class during the season was disappointingly small, the greatest number of starters in any race being seven; most races bringing out four only.

The thanks of the Club are due to the donors of 26 handsome prizes which have been presented during the season, the Club providing 41 first prizes and 38 second prizes.

It is anticipated that during the coming season a challenge will be received from the Shanghai Yacht Club, for an Interport race. The suggestion is that a boat be sent over from Shanghai, to race a series of matches against local yachts. It has been proposed that a challenge should be sent to the Kobe Sailing Club, for races to be held both in Kobe and Yokohama in one design class boats. This will doubtless add considerably to the interest in racing during the coming season.

As regards the financial position of the Club, the accounts speak for themselves.

FAMINE IN NORTHERN JAPAN.

We have been asked to publish the following, and in doing so would desire to bring it to the serious attention of all our readers:—

AN APPEAL IN BEHALF OF THE FAMINE REGION.

Three of the northern provinces—Miyagi, Fukushima, and Iwate—with a population of 2,821,557 are confronting the worst famine since that deadly one of the Tempo Age some sixty years ago. So great is the calamity in Miyagi especially that one of the papers says: "The sentence of death has been passed on the people of this province." If we qualify this sentence by the words, one-third of the people, it is literally true. In a population of 899,279, at least 280,000 are in extreme distress, with no possibility of saving life without aid.

The official statements of the situation reveal in part the intense suffering that hundreds of thousands must endure not only through the winter, but even more so through the entire spring and until new crops are harvested. The main facts need only to be stated to show the necessity of speedy aid.

Miyagi Province is in by far the worst condition. Yen 12,000,000 worth of rice is the average crop, but the yield this year is less than 12 per cent., a loss in rice alone of over yen 10,000,000. This is the sentence of death that hangs over a quarter of a million of people in this one province.

Fukushima Province has a population of 1,174,024. The average rice crop is worth yen 18,553,900. This year's crop is less than one-quarter, and is worth only yen 4,619,762, a loss in rice alone of about yen 14,000,000. But this loss falls mainly on the eastern section of the province where the crop is only 15 per cent. of the average. The extent of the calamity can be imagined when the carefully collected statistics show that some 300,000 people are already in distress and on the edge of absolute poverty.

Iwate is the most fortunate of these three provinces, this year's yield being one-third the average. But here too the southern section is in a wretched condition, since the rice crop is only one-fifth the average yield. Iwate's average crop is worth yen 6,857,770 but this year's is valued at only yen 2,314,020, a loss of 4,543,750 yen among a population of 748,254. We have not accurately learned the number of people who are thrown into starving conditions, but it is certain that over a hundred thousand cannot live without speedy and prolonged help.

Already thousands in these three provinces are reduced to shrub roots and bark of trees by which mere life may for a time be sustained, but at the least calculation, 680,000 people are now facing extreme conditions. What this means for their poor women and children we who live in the centre of this oncoming misery find no words to describe.

Many of the readers of this appeal will recall the famine of Aomori three years ago, and the generous and instant aid rendered by foreigners in Tokyo and Yokohama. The loss of only half a crop brought on that calamity, and contributions amounting to 23,289 yen from foreigners showed their sympathy with the sufferers. But a calamity at least four times as great has fallen on these three provinces, and what increases the distress is the fact that this famine comes at the end of a war that has cost unprecedented sacrifices.

This committee wishes to say very emphatically that this appeal does not emanate from the Japanese, but from foreigners who live in these provinces and are in sympathetic touch with the people and authorities. High spirited as these people are, they yet prize what men everywhere value most highly—substantial sympathy in time of trial and disaster. In the name of our common humanity we appeal to all foreigners in Japan for quick and generous aid.

We shall follow this appeal with ample statements of facts gathered by the committee in personal inspection of the famine fields and in repeated interviews with the provincial, county, and village authorities. We shall give also the methods of relief undertaken by the authorities and relief societies.

Contributions will be received by any of the foreign papers publishing this appeal and all funds will be administered in full consultation with the authorities of the three provinces.

Committee chosen by the foreign community of Sendai.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SATURDAY'S CONCERT.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL")

SIR,—I beg access to your columns for the sake of making a protest against what I consider a most unjustifiable and unfair criticism on Saturday night's concert, which appeared in your issue of this morning. I leave it to the decision of the public who were there, to decide as to whether your criticism in any way voices the sentiments of those who heard the concert.

I presume that you have had the pleasure of writing criticisms upon a good many entertainments during the past four or five years in Yokohama; but I doubt if you have ever been present at one at which there was a larger assemblage of people or anything like such a demonstrative and obviously satisfied and pleased audience.

I myself have played many times at home in an orchestra before, and with all due respect to your critic, I probably can claim to know a little more about the difficulties of orchestral playing than he can. I also know what orchestral concerts in Yokohama have been before, and when I term previous efforts a ludicrous farce, compared with Saturday's concert, I think that I am not making use of too strong an expression. I have heard most of the best orchestras in the world, and if you are to judge Saturday's concert by the standard of what you can hear in Europe or America, I would certainly agree that I have heard better renditions of "Lohengrin" and of the other numbers on the programme; but the standard from which to judge Saturday's concert is undoubtedly from the point of view that five years ago the Japanese students who acquitted themselves so admirably could with difficulty read foreign music, and that during his tenure of office, as chief of the Tokyo Academy of Music, my good and personal friend Mr. Junker has achieved such a success that even his best friends, and others, must admit that it is extraordinary.

The verdict of the audience, which I have since had corroborated by personal inquiries, is that it was the best concert which has ever been given in Yokohama, and, as I have heard a good many and also played in a good number, I have no hesitation in endorsing this.

You will please understand that to me, personally, it matters little what you write, as I was but a unit among the rest of the orchestra; but I think that in view of the fact that nearly fifty Japanese ladies and gentlemen went to the trouble to come to Yokohama, you might have had sufficient consideration for their feelings to have moderated the tone of your remarks.

Your critic certainly writes as though he were anxious to give the impression that he knows something about music, but unfortunately the last statement, that the Strauss waltz was out of place, at once stamps his knowledge of music as decidedly slender. I would like to inform you that this Strauss waltz has been many times played at the Berlin Philharmonic concerts and at the Boston Symphony concerts—the finest concerts in America, and far from under-rating its musical value, it would have been more to the point had you appreciated that it was selected to display the range of music, i.e. from the serious to light music, which the orchestra possessed in its repertoire.

I presume that you will, as is customary (if you insert this letter), add a foot note to the effect that every one has a right to his opinion, and I am not prepared to question that undoubted fact; but I would point out to you that there are occasions when it is possible to express opinions with a little more tact, good judgment and equity.

It seems to me that you had an excellent opportunity of informing those who, unfortunately, could not gain admittance, of the wonderful progress which the Japanese have made in Occidental art, notwithstanding the fact that they have for nearly two years been waging a life and death struggle on the field of battle. This shows that although they have been passing through this terrific crisis, their domestic arrangements and their educational systems at home have in no way suffered, as a consequence of the tremendous strain brought upon the country through the War.

I am, Dear Sir, Yours faithfully,

E. C. DAVIS.

THE JAPANESE EQUIVALENT OF TRUSTEE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Your correspondent "Kyoto," in correcting a passage that occurred in the last Monthly Summary of the Religious Press, implies that Riji is the usual rendering of trustee. I possess no less than 6 dictionaries of English and Japanese and not a single one of them gives Riji as an equivalent of trustee. But of course "Kyoto's" knowledge of Japanese may be greater than that of all the lexicographers. I consulted an expert Japanese translator on the proper translation of trustee and he gave me hokanin and jukunin and observed that Riji was allowable. "Kyoto," possessing a minute knowledge of the affairs of the Dōshisha, was able to tell us in what sense Riji was used in the Kirisutokyo Sekai article. I had only the context to go by, and my acquaintance with Japanese did not warrant me in using the word trustee. There being no difference between the singular and plural forms in Japanese, I could not guess that there had been a dispute between the Conference and a number of Trustees. I am glad to be set right by "Kyoto," but I don't think he quite realizes the difficulty of finding out exactly what has happened by reading such curtailed accounts as one often finds in Japanese newspapers. As for the term Riji it is no doubt used in a very loose or general sense by certain Christians as a kind of equivalent for a trustee. But this use is open to serious objection.

I am, yours, etc.

THE WRITER OF THE SUMMARY.

ORIENTAL HUSBANDS AND OCCIDENTAL WIVES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Apropos of Bishop Awdry's and the Jiji Shimpō's opinions about English women marrying Japanese men, the following personal experience may be of some interest.

Last spring while visiting in a certain city in America of less than 30,000 inhabitants, my hostess informed me that one of the city churches had called a Japanese to be their pastor, that he had an American wife and a "very cute baby." He had been in the town only a few months but had bought a nice residence up on a beautiful terrace and was having it improved. This all sounded very interesting to one who had lived in Japan, especially as this pastor was the only Japanese residing in that place, and it was in part of the country where aliens are fewest and where a foreign tongue is seldom heard. I decided to go and call on the new pastor from the Orient, and in response to the ring of the door bell, a negro woman servant with white apron and cap, all neat as a pin, came to the door. I came very near saying Go-shujin o-uchi desu ka, but caught myself in time to speak in English. I asked the name of the master of the house, but she laughed and said it was a difficult Japanese name which she could not remember. As he was out I left my card, and went to his church next morning, being Sunday, hoping to see him and hear him preach. But in this latter I was disappointed, for a visiting American brother did the preaching, although the pastor conducted the opening and closing exercises, and also received a new member into his church and administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. He did this all in an easy dignified way, except that he seemed to realize that his English was imperfect, which made his deliberation almost tiresome. On entering the church I asked an usher what the pastor's name was but he apologized for not being able to call it. After the service was over I asked two or three persons before I found one who would venture to pronounce his name. Finally a bright young woman gave me what she thought to be his name, but I never did get it exactly till I met the man himself. He was cordial and hospitable, invited me home to eat noon dinner with him. There I met his wife, her mother, a lady friend, and a Japanese student who had just arrived that morning. We three men talked for a while in the language of Nippon much to the amusement of the three ladies. We had a good chicken dinner well served, the man from Japan being perfectly at the head of a dinner table in an American home. His wife was a handsome, blue-eyed, fair woman from Kentucky, which State is noted for its beautiful women and fine horses. After dinner the nine months old baby was brought in for me to see, and I found him to be a fine combination of the East and West. His mother somewhat amused me by asking rather anxiously if I thought he was going to have Japanese eyes. I assured her that I thought he would have very fine eyes and would make a handsome man, for he had made a good beginning. Then she wanted me to tell her something about the Japanese and their customs, "for my husband won't tell me anything," said she. Not knowing her husband's reasons for not telling her what she wanted to know, I felt an embarrassing hesitancy to do so, since I was there as his guest, and he was sitting there in a big arm chair smiling at his wife's questions to me and her curiosity to know what he did and how he lived as a boy.

From a visitor's point of view it seemed to be a well regulated and happy home and no doubt will remain such so long as they are in America, but I could not help thinking then and still wonder what would be the result if they were to come to Japan and he were to take his place among the Japanese Christian pastors on a salary of 40 or 60 yen per month. I am inclined to think that his wife and her mother would then realize the fact, which the Jiji Shimpō does not seem to understand, that there is a vast difference between the alliance of two Governments for fighting purposes and the marriage bond of two units of those nations. One is a conditional limited agreement for a specific purpose; the other is the most sacred, the closest, and the most far-reaching contract that a human being can make, considered from the standpoint of the individual, the family, society at large, or the coming generation.

Yours, etc.,

WILL PATTILLO.

[Why should our correspondent have gone to "a certain city in America" to seek an example of a foreign lady married to a Japanese gentleman? He might have found several instances in Japan.—ED.—J.M.]

THE ASCENT OF YEZO FUJI.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Shiribeshi-yama, commonly known as Yezo Fuji owing to its great similarity in shape to Fuji San, is an extinct volcano taking the form of a perfect cone. The symmetry of its sloping sides is absolutely unmarred by any excrescence such as Hoeizan on the famous mountain in the main island. According to The Times Atlas, published at the office of that paper in London in 1896, the name of this mountain is given as Shiribetsu-Yama, and its height as 7874 feet. Japanese measurements make it much less, one being as low as 6530 shaku. In Chinese characters the name is written in ideographs pronouncing "Yo-tei-zan," and in the Ainu dialect the mountain is called Makkarinupuri. Its similarity to the real Fuji is all the more marked owing to its rising straight out of a large flat plain with no other hills or mountains near it enough to detract in any way from the beauty of its "splendid isolation." With the opening of the section of the Hokkaido Tanko Tetsudo Kaisha between Hakodate and Otaru, the ascent of this mountain, believed to be the highest in the Hokkaido, is now a comparatively easy matter, whereas in days gone by it meant at least a week's journey from Sapporo or any point on the coast, a journey which would necessarily have had to take the form of a small exploring expedition. To the town of Kutchan, or Kuchian, 121 miles from Hakodate, it is a run of seven hours by rail. After passing the picturesque lakes of Junsai-Numa and Onuma, and the active volcano of Komagatake, the line skirts the western shore of Volcano Bay. At Oshabanbe it takes a sharp turn inland through virgin forest till the large plain in which Shiribeshi-yama is situated is reached. After passing Komudake on the right and the river Shiribetsugawa, Kutchan comes into view and it is here that the traveller alights for the climb of the isolated peak of Yezo Fuji. In Ainu language Kutchan means "place of refuge," and it is a well laid out town of the mining or frontier type such as are to be met with in the western states of America or the back blocks of the Australasian colonies. The inn known as Marushin is very comfortable and cheap and very much to be recommended. Mr. Fukuda, the owner, is a host of the good old-fashioned kind, who takes immediate personal superintendence as the following little story will show. A small party of two foreigners arrived at this hotel on the 18th of August last intending to make the ascent of the mountain the next day. In the evening one of them, about 10 p.m., clapped his hands, and in his best Japanese asked the masu to bring his nedai (bedstead) meaning nedoko or bedquills. After some little time a loud noise was heard on the stairs and eight servants appeared carrying two heavy wooden bedsteads which had been obtained from the local hospital about a mile away. Mr. Fukuda will secure a guide and horses for his guests, and introduce them if necessary to Mr. T. Kawai, the President, and Mr. H. Noneyama, Hon. Secretary of the Society called Torankwai, formed by the leading residents of Kutchan to assist people in making the journey to the top of Yezo Fuji. By the efforts of this society Japanese wishing to make the pilgrimage as cheaply as possible can get a 30% reduction from the Railway Co. on third class tickets only. Eight cho from the township the Shiribetsugawa is crossed by means of a trestle bridge on the Isaya road which runs through cultivated land to the small village of Hirose 1½ ri away. This part of the journey can be comfortably performed on horseback. From this point the path up the mountain turns off at a right angle to the left. After passing some swampy land the road leads up through a forest of tall trees in which grouse and wood-pigeon are to be seen and heard. No bears have been shot on the mountain or in this district for some years past. Passing through this forest the gradient gradually becomes steeper and a little way off the track to the left there is a large tarn in a deep hollow reputed to be full of fish. From Hirose 18 cho there is a small and primitive log hut which is honoured with the name of Komagateshi (pony turn back) as past this point it is impossible to take a horse. The path from this onward is a very narrow track cut through the dense undergrowth with which the lower slopes are covered. Zigzagging in some places, straight in others, it becomes steeper and steeper whilst in many places steps have had to be cut in the ground. After rain these become very slippery and nails in one's shoes or waraji and an alpenstock are ordinary necessities. The steepest place on the mountain side is 15 cho from Komagateshi, and anyone who is not perfectly and absolutely sound in wind and limb should never attempt to reach the top. There is nothing difficult about it looking at it from a mountaineer's point of view or that of an Alpine climber. There is no question of ropes or ice-axes or difficult rock climbing but merely one of great endurance. The writer of this account has climbed Fuji San, Asamayama, Asosan and Etna and found them all easy walks compared to Yezo Fuji. Well might he have said in the elegant verse of a celebrated Japanese verse maker, slightly altered:—"The mountain which I found harder to climb than I had heard, than I had thought, than I had seen, was Yezo Fuji's peak." At a height of 3,700 feet above sea level only hai matsu (creeping pines) are to be seen, the path having to be cut through them at great cost of time and labour. Twelve cho from the summit there is a small pond full of good drinking water, and beautiful red and yellow flowers called Tsuge-sakura and Miyama Kimbo are to be seen and gathered in their respective seasons. On the top of the mountain there are three craters with circumferences of two, a half and a quarter miles respectively. No eruptions have taken place for a considerable period as the floors of these craters are none of them very deep and appear to be solid ground with no vents in them, but with a good deal of vegetation covering them in places. In fact the creeping pines round the edge of the largest crater are so thick that it would take a very long time to walk round it. The most recent disturbance seems to have taken place in the smallest crater of the three, as huge blocks of black lava are heaped up nearly level with the rim in indescribable confusion. Magnificent views on a clear day are to be got from various points on the summit. Southwards the whole of Volcano Bay lies spread out like a huge lake with Komagatake smoking on the farther side, and Komudake in the foreground. To the west Iwanobori—the Sulphur mountain—cuts the sky line with its jagged peaks and to the eastward Yubaridake and Tarumazan loom up out of the horizon. On the northern side the view embraces the whole of the Otaru district and the hills of the Muinedake range. The Japanese allow 5 hours for the ascent, but a good walker can easily accomplish it under four. It will take the best part of 2½ hours to descend, and there is no choice of routes as there is only the one path described above. The distance from the base to the summit is reckoned as 3½ miles, and the hire for the guide is only 75 sen per day. There are no huts on or near the top where shelter can be obtained, so given fine weather Shiribeshi-yama may be reckoned on as a one day's expedition. From enquiries made from the officials of the Tozankwai, it appears that only two foreigners had climbed to the top before Aug. 19th last, the first being a Frenchman and the second a Korean. Mr. H. E. Daunt, of Kobe, climbed the mountain on the above mentioned date in 3 hours and 20 minutes, closely followed by Mr. R. C. Ross of Yokohama.

FAN KWAL

CELERITY IN SHIPBUILDING.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

Sir,—In an editorial note of the 8th inst. you very justly praise the Kure dockyard people for smart work in building the Tsukuba in less than twelve months, but you add: "in point of celerity of construction English dockyards alone could rival Japan's time."

Now with that peculiar modesty which is the one conspicuous charm in the character of us, your cousins across the Atlantic from England, or just over the Pacific from yourself personally; I ask if that "alone" is not redundant?

Yours, etc.

A. MERRY CUSS.

[We believe we are correct in supposing that English ship-builders are the quickest in the world, at present. What the American could do, if they tried, or what they could not do, is another question—a question which only a rash man would attempt to answer.—ED. /M.]

STORM SIGNAL CODE.

Notice is given by the Imperial Maritime Customs of China that on and after the 1st January, 1906, a new Storm Signal Code, using Symbols instead of Flags, will come into operation at the Storm Signal Stations of the Imperial Maritime Customs at the following places:—

Newchwang	Chinkiang.	Pagoda Anchorage.
Taku.	Woosung.	Amoy.
Chefoo.	Gutzlaff.

Copies of the new Code can be obtained from the several Harbour Offices. At Shanghai the Municipal Storm Signal Station will also use the new Code. At this Station and also at Woosung and Gutzlaff the special local weather signals, by means of flags, will be continued as before, but International Flags will be substituted for the Marryat's flags hitherto used: see Code issued by Sicauei Observatory, which can be obtained at the Municipal Storm Signal Station, Shanghai.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SPECIAL SERVICE.)

CATASTROPHE AT CHARING CROSS STATION.

London, December 7.

A portion of the roof of Charing Cross Station collapsed yesterday, the girders falling upon passing trains, smashing cabs and demolishing the roof of the Avenue Theatre. Several were killed and thirty were injured.

ROOSEVELT'S MESSAGE.

Congress has been opened. President Roosevelt in his message says supervision must be exercised over the enormous powers that trusts at present wield, even if the Constitution has to be amended. Though rigid economy is necessary, it would be a national crime to cut down the expenditures on the Navy or delay work on the Panama Canal. The main cause of the boycott in China has been resentment on the part of students and merchants against the harshness of the American law towards educated Chinamen. These classes should be encouraged to come to America and be treated on precisely the same footing as other foreigners of similar classes—Chinese labour only being excluded. The President expressed himself as cordially in sympathy with Japan's avowed purpose to stand for the integrity of China and said that such an attitude tended to the preservation of the peace of the world.

BRITISH SQUADRONS.

Later.

The Channel, Atlantic, and Mediterranean Squadrons, with three armoured cruiser Squadrons, assemble at Lagos, Portugal, about the middle of February for combined exercises.

NO INTERVIEW.

The report of an interview having taken place between Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and the Duke of Devonshire is erroneous. It was a case of mistaken identity.

ADMIRAL FISHER PROMOTED.

Admiral Sir John Fisher has been promoted to the rank of Admiral of the Fleet.

SWISS LEGATION FOR TOKYO.

London, December 8.

The Swiss National Council has approved of the establishment of a Legation in Tokyo.

GERMANY.

Prince Bülow, addressing the Reichstag, said that the mere maintenance of correct relations between the Cabinets of any countries did not exhaust the number of problems affecting their policies, for it was also to be remembered that popular passions might sometimes jeopardise the Cabinets' policies. For example, Germany has now to reckon with deep popular aversion against her in England; only recently has any tendency to counteract this dangerous tension been noticeable in leading English circles. He sincerely hoped that it indicated the beginning of a desire for the renewal of the good understanding which had been unfortunately interrupted.

Prince Bulow said the Triple Alliance was unimpaired, but Germany must be strong enough to hold her own without allies.

As to East Asia, the relations between Germany and Japan were good and friendly; he believed that the Japanese, who through their bravery and intelligence had won a position among the great Powers, were anxious to consolidate their position by a policy which would inspire the confidence of all.

The Anglo-Japanese Treaty, he said, contains nothing contrary to Germany's aims; Germany had striven for and desired the "open door," the greatest possible security for the peace and maintenance of the integrity and independence of China.

MR. TAKAHASHI.

Mr. Takahashi sails homewards via America on December 20th.

DISORDERS IN TRANS-CASPIA.

There are grave disorders in the Trans-Caspian territories. The troops are participating, especially at Askabad.

BRITISH POLITICS.

It is believed that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman will go to the House of Lords, leaving Mr. Asquith to represent the Party in the Lower House.

PANAMA CANAL FINANCE.

London, December 9.

Washington telegrams report that Congress has passed a vote of eleven million dollars as an "emergency appropriation" for Panama Canal work.

RUSSIAN BANKS EXPOSTULATE.

At St. Petersburg, the directors of the private-owned banks have informed the Minister of Finance that they will be obliged to cease business, unless the postal and telegraph strikes are speedily ended.

NEW BRITISH CABINET.

London, December 10.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, yielding to the wishes of the Radicals, has decided to lead the House of Commons. Sir Edward Grey declines to join the Cabinet, desiring to see Mr. Asquith lead the Commons, with Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman in the House of Lords. This necessitates the re-casting of the Cabinet. The Westminster Gazette, on the other hand, announces authoritatively that all difficulties regarding the Cabinet places have been settled to the satisfaction of all concerned.

The Times announces that Sir Edward Grey becomes Foreign Secretary of State, in place of Lord Lansdowne.

The Ministerial speakers at political meetings are making a feature of Home Rule.

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, speaking at Oxford, said the name was to be abandoned but the policy (of the Liberals) remains unchanged; home rule was to be granted to Ireland in instalments under the hire system. He urged the importance of fiscal reform from the Imperial standpoint, aiming at the inclusion of all the colonies in one sufficient mutually supporting federation, and declared that nothing had arisen in the slightest degree affecting the personal friendship or his political relationship with Mr. Balfour.

Later.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach (who has just been out to the Far East on the Tanjong Pagar Dock Arbitration proceedings) has been created a Viscount.

The following appointments to the new Cabinet are regarded as probable:—

Mr. Asquith, Chancellor of the Exchequer.
Mr. John Morley, Secretary for India.
Sir Edward Grey, Secretary for Foreign Affairs.
The Earl of Elgin, Secretary for the Colonies.
Mr. Haldane, Secretary for War.
Lord Tweedmouth, First Lord of the Admiralty.
Mr. Fowler, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.
Lord Aberdeen, Viceroy of Ireland.
Mr. Bryce, Chief Secretary for Ireland.

London, December 11.

The list of probable appointments conveyed in Reuter's telegram of Sunday, is confirmed officially. The following additional appointments have been made:—

First Lord of the Treasury, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.
Lord Chancellor, Sir Robert Reid.
Secretary for Home Affairs, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.
President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Lloyd George.
President of the Local Government Board, Mr. John Burns.
Secretary for Scotland, Sir John Sinclair.
President of the Board of Agriculture, Earl Carrington.
Post Master-General, Mr. Sydney Buxton.
Lord President of the Council, the Earl of Crewe.
Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Marquis of Ripon.
Minister for Education, Mr. Augustine Birrell.
Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Lord Justice Walker.
First Commissioner of Works, Sir L. Harcourt.

London, December 12.

It is agreed on all sides that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has enlisted in his Cabinet the strongest members of his party excluding Lord Rosebery. Even the Unionists admit that it is good and capable.

Later.

Lord Elgin's appointment as Secretary for the Colonies, is favourably received. The combination of Lord Aberdeen, as Viceroy, and Mr. Bryce, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, is regarded as an indication of a definite Home Rule policy.

The new ministers have all been installed. Mr. George Whiteley, M.P. for the Pudsey Division of York, has been appointed chief Government Whip.

London, December 13.

King Edward has signed the formal document ordering the prorogation of Parliament till the 14th of January, but the dissolution will probably take place on the 10th of January.

Later.

The following appointments have been made :—

Mr. Winston Churchill, Under Secretary for the Colonies.

Mr. Lawson Walton, K.C., Attorney-General.

Mr. John Ellis, Under Secretary for India.
The Earl of Portsmouth, Under Secretary for War.

Mr. Edmund Robertson, Secretary to the Admiralty.

Mr. John Mackenna, Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Herbert Samuel, Under Secretary for the Home Office.

Sir Robert Causton, Paymaster-General.
Mr. William Snowden Robson, K.C.,
Solicitor General.

MUTINIES IN RUSSIA.

London, December 10.

Military mutinies are spreading throughout Russia. Occasionally loyal corps intervene but generally the mutineers are unopposed.

MUTINY AT WARSAW.

London, December 11.

It is reported that the whole garrison of Warsaw have mutinied.

THE TSAR AND THE COSSACKS.

London, December 12.

The Tsar has issued an Order of the Day warmly thanking all the Cossacks for their untiring and loyal services in maintaining order in the Russian empire.

DEATH OF SIR JOHN WALSHAM.

London, December 13.

Sir John Walsham, ex British Minister to China, is dead, aged 75.

THE NORTH BORNEO DINNER.

London, December 14.

Mr. W. C. Cowie, speaking at the North Borneo Dinner, dwelt on the extraordinary railway and manganese development. The manganese alone would soon be worth many millions. The smokeless coal was among the possibilities of the territory. Sir West Ridgway, former Governor of Ceylon, eulogised the work of the company, whose policy, he said, was bound to meet with its reward.

Sir Charles Jessel, Chairman of the British North Borneo Company, responded for the State of North Borneo.

SEVERE DECISIONS BY THE ADMIRALTY.

The Admiralty relieves the captain of the first-class battleship Commonwealth of his command, and censures the captains of the first-class battleships Hindustan and Canopus and the second-class cruiser Arrogant, all of which were lying in Tutuan Bay when the repair ship Assistance stranded there. They supersede the four lieutenants who were officers of the watch on those vessels.

Later.

The Admiralty minute also regrets that Admiral W. H. May selected an unsafe berth for the Assistance.

The newspapers, while regretting the punishment of meritorious officers, commend unanimously the decisions of the Admiralty in view of the supreme necessity of upholding discipline and efficiency in the Navy.

(RECEIVED IN TOKYO.)

TSAR FIRED AT.

A Berlin telegram, dated Dec. 13th, says that the Tsar was fired at by one of the Revolutionary Party on that date, and received a slight wound.

THE PEKING NEGOTIATIONS.

Friday, December 15.

In an extra issued on the 14th instant the Fiji Shimpō published a long telegram received from Shanghai and taken from the columns of a Russian newspaper organ in that place which, in turn, had received it from a Peking correspondent. The telegram gave what purported to be a résumé of the demands made by the Chinese Government at the Conference now going on in Peking, and of the terms to which the Japanese Plenipotentiaries have agreed. Considering that the news came from a Russian source and that it was transmitted via Shanghai, we did not attach credence to it, or reproduce it, and we adhere to that course. Several of our Tokyo contemporaries, including the Fiji itself, while reserving credence in the account, make it the subject of comments which show that if the Russian version be correct we shall see Japan invaded by another wave of discontent. We do not ourselves expect any very satisfactory treaty; that is to say, satisfactory from the point of view of the man in the Japanese street, and we have endeavoured from time to time to make it clear that intelligence emanating from the most trustworthy quarters showed China to be in a mood not at all favourable to Japan's claims. It is not too much to say, perhaps, that China has shown herself very inaccessible to the dictates of gratitude. However, the end is not yet, and until more trustworthy news arrives, we shall not perplex our readers with mere rumours.

Meanwhile the direct telegraphic intelligence from Peking is that, at the request of the Chinese Plenipotentiaries the 17th meeting of the conference, which was to have taken place on the 14th instant, has been postponed. In fact, no progress seems to have been made since the 14th meeting, when Prince Ching apparently attended the Conference for the first time. The conjecture is that the question of railway extensions is now blocking the way, and that a further interval will be needed in order to arrive at an understanding. The particular extension under discussion is said to be that from Antung to Mukden where a Japanese military line is already in actual existence.

Saturday, December 16.

Telegrams from Peking dated the 15th instant represent the negotiations as at a standstill. The reports are somewhat more explicit, and they indicate, if trustworthy, that a stage has only now been reached which was generally supposed to have been already passed. For we learn that the great question of the hour is railway concessions. The Chinese Plenipotentiaries allege that a foreign-owned line from Hsinmintun to Mukden can not be thought of, inasmuch as it would lead to the Imperial Tombs which must be kept sacrosanct, and as for the Changchun-Kirin line, they say that no concession was ever granted to Russia and consequently the matter must be treated as an altogether independent issue. It will be remembered that at a comparatively early stage of the negotiations these roads were said to have come up for discussion, with the result that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries withdrew their demand for the Hsinmintun-Mukden concession on condition of receiving the Changchun-Kirin concession. Apparently, however, that version was only a conjecture, and we infer that the problem of railway concessions was among the principal points postponed for ultimate consideration.

Nothing is now said, we observe, about the Antung-Mukden line.

The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondent telegraphs that at the commencement of the conference the Chinese Plenipotentiaries stated that they had received instructions from the Throne directing them to limit all concessions in strict accord with those held by Russia at the outbreak of the war. In short, Japan, who had saved China from seeing the Three Eastern Provinces fall into Russian possession permanently, was to be rewarded by receiving exactly the same treatment that Russia had received at China's hands. That is the spirit in which the Chinese Plenipotentiaries have conducted the negotiations from first to last, and it is because they evinced such a spirit that we have always expressed doubts as to the successful issue of the conference. Whatever China's natural disposition may be, she is at present under the sway of a most illiberal mood, and is apparently incapable of discriminating between friends and enemies. Her pretext about the Hsinmintun-Mukden concession illustrates this, for if the question of the Imperial Tombs have any value as regards such a concession, then it should have been equally prohibitive of the whole East-Chinese Railway which runs past Mukden, and its logical outcome would be to segregate Mukden altogether from the railway system of Manchuria. In other words, the fact that the capital city happens to be the burial place of the dynastic ancestors would condemn it to isolation for all time. Such arguments put their users outside the pale of all rational sympathy, and incline one to throw up the sponge and abandon China to her fate.

Sunday, December 17.

The 18th meeting of the Plenipotentiaries took place on the 15th but no decision was reached. The Plenipotentiaries parted for further reflection, promising to meet again on the 16th.

There is a report that Russia and France are working vigorously in combination to block the path of the Japanese negotiators, and that each postponement is an unfavourable sign.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun has a very strong article on this subject. It declares that the honour of Japan is at stake and that, failing Chinese consent to her reasonable proposals, she must adopt such measures as the interests of self-protection and the preservation of Far-Eastern peace dictate. The Fiji writes in a similar strain. It characterizes China's pretexts as frivolous and evasive. The plea that the Hsinmintun-Mukden road can not be placed in foreign hands since that is the route taken by Imperial personages when proceeding to worship at the Ancestral Tombs is almost laughable when considered in the context of Mukden's recent occupation by Russian troops, and the pretence that no concession having been granted to Russia for the Kirin-Changchun line, none can now be granted to Japan, resembles the argument of a hedge-lawyer. Russia had actually surveyed the route of the line and it was a notorious fact that she contemplated building it, yet China never raised the slightest objection. How, at all events, can these petty matters be placed in the same category with the immense service rendered by Japan to China? The Fiji recommends that rather than yield to China's unreason and ingratitude, the negotiations should be broken off. Japan can afford to wait until China comes to her senses. The Shoggo Shimpō is equally emphatic. It reminds China that the objects of Japan's proposals are mainly to secure to the Middle Kingdom the sovereignty of Manchuria and to provide means for utilizing the policy of the open door. Under the circumstances it is profoundly disappointing to find China treating Japan with even more distrust than she showed towards Russia.

Monday, December 18.

The 18th conference on the 15th instant seems to have been unproductive and again the Japanese Plenipotentiaries, being eminently anxious to conclude the negotiations in a friendly manner, gave their Chinese colleagues a third opportunity of considering the situation. Hence the 16th was a dies non, and the 19th meeting was fixed for the 17th.

The Fiji Shimpō's Peking correspondent says that Viceroy Yuan's position is very difficult but hints that the attitude of the Japanese is not very resolute and that, in addition to the railway complication, the question of guards has not been settled.

The Nichi Nichi's correspondent confirms this and says that the Chinese are labouring to break down Japan's resolve. The requests that they repeatedly make for further time to consider are in fact a device to wear out the other side's patience. Prince Ching now attends the conferences regularly, but takes practically no part in the debates. He leaves everything to Viceroy Yuan and Mr. Ku Fung-ki, and acts as though he were himself an outsider.

It is reported (Fiji Shimpō) that these interminable delays on the part of the Chinese have become almost intolerable. The Minister of Foreign Affairs can not remain week after week in Peking when the Diet is on the verge of meeting in Tokyo. He must return to Japan, and since the Chinese seem incapable of making up their minds in anything like a reasonable time, it is beginning to be thought—by whom we do not learn—that the best plan will be to embody in a convention the matters already decided, and to leave the rest in the category of open questions. We do not quite see how that would work, especially in the matter of railways, for Japan could scarcely set about constructing within Chinese territory lines for which China had not granted concessions. The status quo might of course be maintained, and in the status quo would be included the Antung-Mukden railway which is already an actually accomplished fact; but the Kirin-Changchun line is one to which great strategical importance attaches. China loves to have unsettled questions lying in pigeon-holes whence they can be drawn at convenient moments. Her modern history shows that next to a diplomatic success she relishes a diplomatic failure which gives her a grievance. We believe that she would gladly reserve, at the present juncture, as many concessions as possible in the hope of selling them dearer by and bye. It is a poor policy to pursue towards a friend who has served her so signally as Japan has.

The Fiji Shimpō again writes very strongly. The line it takes is that Japan should quietly retire from the conference and maintain the status quo in Manchuria. We presume that our contemporary means by the status quo the continuance of Japanese military government throughout Hsingking, the working of the Newchwang Customs, the running of the Antung-Mukden line, the levying of taxes and the taking of all measures essential to military administration; provided always that such a system could be operated without violating the engagement to withdraw the troops within a period of 18 months. Were that proviso difficult of attainment, a civil government could be substituted and equipped with all the necessary machinery. Such we assume to be the fiji's meaning, and such would certainly be a most effective course so far as China is concerned. But it would react upon Russia also. Russia would be sure to act in Kirin and Amur exactly as the Japanese acted in Hsingking, and the strong probability, nay the certainty, is that under such circumstances Manchuria would be lost for ever to China. That would be a curious outcome of a war fought for the purpose of preserving it to her. It would, however, be an outcome due entirely to her own strange want of political intuition.

The Hochi takes the same line but lays the blame on the shoulders of the Japanese Government and urges that the conference should be broken off until Japan has a Cabinet competent to deal with the situation.

We read in the fiji Shimpō's Peking correspondence that the Chinese Government, considering it necessary to hold some conference with Russia at the present juncture, has appointed Mr. Tang Shao-i—of Tibetan fame—to confer with M. Pokotiloff. The latter, however, being unable to establish telegraphic communication with St. Petersburg owing to the disturbances in Russia, is not in a position to respond to Mr. Tang's request. Meanwhile he (M. Pokotiloff) is working strenuously to discover the details of the conference going on between China and Japan, and has offered a reward of twenty thousand taels for information.

The last part of this story is not reconcilable with the North-China Daily News's account that a prelate of the Greek Church has the entrée to the Palace and is in daily communication with Li Lien-yung, the chief eunuch, on the one hand, and M. Pokotiloff on the other. Moreover the story is not consistent with its own details for if Tang Shao-i has been appointed to confer with M. Pokotiloff in direct connexion with the China-Japan negotiations, he (Tang) must necessarily disclose to the Russian the details of these negotiations. On the whole it may be strongly doubted whether the secrecy preserved towards the general public is maintained with equal success, or even with anything like equal care, towards the foreign Chiefs de Mission in Peking. They probably know very well what is going on.

Tuesday, December 19.

The fiji Shimpō's Peking correspondent says that the 20th meeting of the conference was to take place on the 18th instant, and that as only one point remained to be settled a speedy termination of the negotiations was expected. The Kokumin's correspondent mentions merely that the twentieth meeting was expected.

It is reported that when the main questions are all disposed of, Baron Komura will return to Japan, leaving Mr. Uchida to settle the details, but this report is not based on infallible authority.

The fiji Shimpō repeats its argument that the only wise course is to break off the negotiations and wait until China resumes them of her own accord. Our contemporary's view is that Japan is in an absolutely masterful situation. She holds Manchuria which China wants to recover. She can continue to hold it until China consents to reasonable terms of restitution. There is nothing to hamper Japan. Her former enemy, Russia, has openly recognised her position and the world has recognised it. No Plenipotentiaries ever entered a negotiation chamber with a stronger case than the Japanese Plenipotentiaries had. Yet we see interminable delays and hear of cardinal concessions. To bring China to her senses there is nothing for it but to leave her in the enjoyment of her own unreason and obstinacy.

The Nichi Nichi takes a more moderate line. It admits that Japan must endure some sacrifice in view of the obligation she owes to the preservation of peace in the future. Her two guiding principles are to secure the results of the Portsmouth Treaty and to ensure the permanent tranquillity of the Orient. Whatever settlement she makes must be in accord with those aims. As for China's talk of preserving her sovereignty and asserting her dignity, who is it but Japan that has enabled her to preserve the one or to assert the other. Where would her sovereignty and her dignity be now if Japan had not intervened to protect them, and can there be anything more incongruous than the notion that this same Japan should now be the corpus vile of China's attempts to recover her forfeited prestige? She must rely on Japan, and must agree to grant to the latter in Manchuria a position such that the maintenance of peace shall be possible without undue sacrifice. The negotiations, the Nichi Nichi thinks, ought not to prevent any special difficulties, but it is inclined to believe that Baron Komura is allowing himself to be again played with as he was played with by Count Witte; namely, is consenting to postpone all the really serious issues and to fritter away his strength and his time over the discussion of minor counts.

The Asahi, however, alleges on the authority of its Peking correspondent that the difficult problems, or, at any rate, the remaining problems, are expected to be all disposed of at the meetings on the 18th and 19th, so that the conclusion of the conference is now a matter of a few days only.

The Kokumin Shimbun controverts the rumours recently circulated as to the ill success of the Conference. It denies, in effect, that the negotiations are proceeding unsatisfactorily and that there is any occasion to break them off or to resort to any extreme measure. As to the contention advanced in some quarters—notably by the fiji Shimpō—that, in view of the commanding position occupied by Japan there was no occasion to send as Plenipotentiary an official of such importance as the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Kokumin justly observes that Japan had to consider something besides her own convenience; she had to consider the sentiment of her vis-à-vis. She entered upon this war largely on account of China's integrity and sovereignty, and it would ill become her in the hour of victory to show any disregard for China's imperial titles. Hence her choice of ambassador. It was dictated by the far-seeing view that China must not be merely a subscribing party to any arrangements made, but must be also a willing party. The Kokumin does not fear that China will show herself indifferent to the dictates of sincerity or gratitude.

Wednesday, December 20.

The Kokumin Shimbun's Peking correspondent telegraphs under date of the 18th instant that the long negotiations have ended and that the treaty is concluded. He alleges, in effect, that there are two treaties. One may be called the direct sequel of the Portsmouth Peace Convention. It embodies all the points and more than all the points, indicated by the latter and it will be published under the name of the "Manchurian Treaty." The other is a convention to which the correspondent alludes somewhat mysteriously. He says that it contains important concessions and arrangements but that it will not be published; not immediately at all events, though the right to publish it at any time should circumstances dictate such a course is reserved to Japan. In short, the general tone of this correspondent's telegram is exceedingly optimistic. He suggests that all the rumours as to China's want of insight and defective sense of gratitude were erroneous, and that a thoroughly satisfactory arrangement has been made, though he hints that the Manchurian Treaty may be found to include some points inviting criticism. The Asahi's correspondent partially confirms this view. He says that on the 18th the draft Treaty as well as the minutes of the conference were approved by the Plenipotentiaries; that the signature of the treaty is expected to take place on the 21st, and that, in one way or another, Japan's main proposals have been successfully obtained. This is confirmed by the Nichi Nichi's correspondent though he differs slightly from the others in his account of details of procedure. These are unimportant, however. The main point is that at the 20th meeting on the 18th instant the difficulties that remained unsettled were disposed of, and a treaty has been concluded which this correspondent describes at a success. Somewhat more explicit information is given by the Hochi's correspondent. He says that the difficult problem awaiting discussion on the 18th instant was that of the Hsinmintun-Mukden and Kirin-Changchun railways. Wiring before the meeting of Plenipotentiaries he indicated that this question would find its solution either in Japan abandoning the former line and obtaining the latter, or in her getting both. Wiring after the meeting he is a little vague, his account merely being that Japan's wishes seem to have been carried out. He adds that Baron Komura intends to leave Peking on the 24th, spend 2 days in Tientsin, and proceed thence (embarking at Chingwantao) via Port Arthur, Dalny and Chemulpho, arriving in Japan about the 4th of January. Alone the fiji Shimpō's correspondent differs from his colleagues. He confirms them in so far as that the treaty has been concluded and that it will not be published until after the exchange of ratifications, but he alleges that, according to the information obtained by him, the Japanese Plenipotentiaries have made large concessions in the matter of the Hsinmintun-Mukden and Kirin-Changchun roads, both of which, according to the agreement, are to be constructed by China herself.

The fiji Shimpō accepts its correspondent's statement and indeed goes a great deal beyond his account, for, while professing unwillingness to violate secrecy, it declares that Japan has yielded not only with regard to the two railways mentioned above, but also with regard to several other points which the nation had a right to regard as virtually settled. We do not recall that during the past thirty years we have ever read a more vehement attack on the Cabinet in general and on the Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs in particular than this incident evokes from the fiji. Our contemporary declares, in almost so many words, that to leave such a Cabinet any longer in power would be a disgrace and a danger to the nation. It distinguishes between the Portsmouth negotiations and the Peking negotiations in so far as that the Japanese Plenipotentiaries were acting in the former case under instructions from the Cabinet, whereas in the latter case Count Katsura and Baron Komura are the chief delinquents. The fiji further characterizes the Peking negotiations as very easy and is much incensed that the Government had not even the resolution and the wisdom to break off the conference when it was found to be taking a turn hopelessly disadvantageous to Japan.

Thursday, December 21.

According to the Kokumin's correspondence, which is confirmed by news from other quarters, the new treaty is to be signed to-day (22nd). Our contemporary's telegrams say that the treaty secures all the conditions contemplated by the Portsmouth Peace Convention. Its contents are thus summarized:—

- (1) The leasing of Liaotung to Japan.
- (2) The ownership of the railway south of Changchun together with all associated privileges of mining, timber-felling and so forth.
- (3) The concession of the Antung-Mukden Line. (But there is some doubt whether this refers solely to the military line already in existence, or whether its conversion into a general-service road is included in the concession).
- (4) The opening of over ten new markets in Manchuria and the sanction of overland commerce between Manchuria and Korea.
- (5) The posting of railway guards by Japan, unless China succeeds in effecting some arrangement with Russia, on this subject, in which case Japan will endorse the arrangement.

Certain other very important points are said to have been settled between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Powers, but having regard to the present situation these are not likely to be published immediately, though they may be disclosed by Baron Komura to the Diet in secret session.

It will be observed that nothing is said of the Kirin-Changchun or the Hsinmintun-Mukden railways. Already mutterings of discontent are heard on this subject. No wonder there is disappointment. But it has to be remembered after all, as the Kokumin Shimbun justly observes, that Japan was not treating in Peking with a conquered country. She was treating with a friendly neighbour whom it is her object to placate.

The Emperor of China has decided, it is said, to confer suitable decorations on Baron Komura and the members of his suite. On the 20th the Baron, Mr. Uchida and the rest of the party were entertained at luncheon by His Majesty at the Summer Palace.

CASUALTIES IN WAR.

Dr. Menge, in a letter published in our correspondence columns, takes exception to a statement recently made by us, namely, that if as many Japanese soldiers perished from disease as from bullets and bayonets, the grand total would not exceed 90,000, "a figure less by nearly forty thousand than the German losses in the war of 1871." Our correspondent, who appears to be somewhat annoyed by the comparison, if we may judge from his courteous reference to our "various fallacies made from time to time on German affairs," presents a list of casualties which he describes as "correct and official," but which we must really decline to regard as either the one or the other, for it would be an insult to the well-known accuracy of the Germans to assert that a list in which the number of sick is represented by a note of interrogation can be properly called "correct" or "official." Dr. Menge makes out, however, that the number of deaths in the German Army—deaths in action, deaths from wounds and deaths from disease—aggregated only 40,743. To that we can only reply by quoting Field Marshal Count Von Moltke's statement in his celebrated work "The Franco-German War," which, having been published in 1892, must be supposed to contain thoroughly accurate information. "The War," says the great Captain, "had cost the Germans many victims; they lost 6,247 officers, 123,433 men, 1 flag and 6 guns." According to Von Moltke, then, the Germans "lost" 129,680 officers and men, and it was this figure we had in mind when we said that the Japanese total of 90,000 was "a figure less by nearly forty thousand than the German losses." Perhaps the explanation of the discrepancy is to be found in the meaning that attaches to the word "lost." It will be observed that Dr. Menge's figure for the aggregate German "casualties"—not "killed" but "killed and wounded" together—is 129,700, which tallies almost exactly with Von Moltke's 129,680 "lost." In English we generally understand "lost" as referring to the dead only, but we are inclined to think that the German Field Marshal used it in a more comprehensive sense. Accepting Dr. Menge's figures, for which we tender him our thanks, it would appear that the German casualties in action were 129,700 and the Japanese were 201,973 (omitting 16,456 injured but not in action). Thus the war just ended stands out as one of the bloodiest in the history of the world. And if the Russian casualties were added, what would the aggregate be?

RUSSIA.

The disquieting news from Harbin is confirmed (Kokumin Shimbun) by Chinese travellers arriving in Peking. They say that at the beginning of this month the soldiers broke out into mutiny and were joined by Chinese adventurers, so that the town was almost sacked. Numbers of the inhabitants had to fly. This is confirmed by telegrams to the Asahi from Washington to the effect that one half of Linevitch's army is in a state of mutiny and that unless he can re-establish his authority the results will be disastrous.

All these reports, combined with those previously received, go to show that the Russian nation is permeated with discontent and disaffection. Machinery to give practical effect to the sentiment may be wanting for the moment, but such a defect is always remediable. Linevitch himself is said to have reported (Kokumin's San Francisco correspondence) to his Government that a moiety of his troops are mutinous and that he is without means to restore his authority. It is difficult to see what mutinous Russian soldiers could effect in Manchuria, especially at this season. The home Government has always the resource of starving out the mutineers, if the worst comes to the worst. In the meanwhile, however, a stupendous calamity might have to be recorded.

The telegrams this morning indicate that the Russian Government has resolved to have recourse to extreme measures in suppressing the revolution, and that a commencement has been made by arresting the whole council of the workmen's delegates. It may be assumed, then, that Count Witte's programme of liberal reform has been abandoned and that he himself has either lost his influence or been forced by the pressure of circumstances into the other camp. The view taken of Witte's projects in Japan seems to be that they are too heroic. He seeks to accomplish too much in too short a time. The materials with which he has to work are not adapted for such rapid and radical moulding. It is hard to say whether such a view is correct, but if it be so, the fact is very lamentable, for evidently a large section of the Russian nation is not prepared to be content with anything less than what M. Witte proposes, and there is the further misfortune that having been once allowed to catch a glimpse of the light, the people are not likely to quietly endure relapse into utter darkness. At all events the two forces are now to join issue, and the world is invited to sit in contemplation of a drama which may be one of the most terrible ever witnessed. Perhaps the best thing to hope is that the authorities have not under-estimated their strength and that by a full display of it they may be able to avert calamitous opposition. Reform must come. The question now is only one of sooner or later, and what all humane persons must desire is that the situation will be held under strict control so as to prevent excesses such as have already been witnessed.

A telegram to the Hochi Shimbun from Washington says that Linevitch has officially reported his inability to command the Manchurian Army, and that the report has produced profound consternation in St. Petersburg, as well it might. But how are we to credit this telegram in the context of Reuter's information that the Russian Government have resolved to put down the insurrection by force?

The Kokumin Shimbun publishes an account of the outbreak at Harbin on the 28th of November. We read that towards nightfall a number of mutinous soldiers rushed into the streets and set fire to various Government buildings, murdering and pillaging. General Madoriloff, whose Cossacks were bivouacked outside the town, immediately mustered his troopers and rode in at their head, his idea being to restore order at one coup. He resorted to extreme measures, sabering some 400 of the mutineers and setting the torch to their barracks. But presently the Cossacks fell out among themselves, and the mutineers, taking advantage of this, attacked them and recovered the upper hand. There ensued a fearful scene of outrage, carnage and destruction of property, and since that time the city is said to be in a most unquiet condition.

FUNERAL OF VICE-ADMIRAL TSUNODA.

The funeral ceremony in honour of the late Vice-Admiral Tsunoda, who, at the time of his death, was in command of the naval station at Takeshiki, took place in the Awoyama Cemetery on the 19th at 10.50 a.m., in accordance with Buddhist rites. Vice-Admiral Dewa commanded the naval party. The coffin was placed on a gun-carriage and was accompanied by four pieces of artillery, while some 300 men formed the guard of honour. Among those that followed the cortège were Admiral Baron Yamamoto, Admiral Viscount Ito, Admiral Inouye, Admiral Kabayama, Rear-Admiral Saito, Vice-Admiral Kamimura, Vice-Admiral Ijuin, a representative of the Minister of State for War and some 800 officers of the Navy and Army. An Imperial Chamberlain was sent to the house of the deceased to convey the condolences of the Court.

RIOTS IN SHANGHAI.

Tuesday, December 19.

There appears to be quite a serious disturbance in Shanghai. The Chinese have all closed their shops and the foreign firms are said to have done the same. Assaults on foreign residents are spoken of, and one account says that ladies cannot pass through the streets without a guard. Some telegrams tell of houses wrecked and other of jinrikisha smashed, but all agree that the ships are landing marines and that the Volunteers have been called out, and all agree further that no attempt is made to molest Japanese subjects. Among the mass of unconnected rumours it is hard to detect the truth, but at any rate there can be no doubt that a serious state of affairs exists.

Differences of opinion appear in describing the cause also. Some attribute it to the agitation of the anti-American boycotters, but inasmuch as no reason is assigned for any sudden ebullition in that context, we are disposed rather to credit a different analysis, namely, that which refers the matter to the recent case in the Mixed Court. Indeed the telegraphic news generally points to the latter hypothesis, and as the incident may become historical, we here quote the report of the occurrences in the Mixed Court on the 8th instant:—

Two women and three men were put before the Court on charges of kidnapping girls from their homes in Szechuan. Fifteen young girls, who were to be the witnesses in the case, had been cared for by the Municipal police, and were brought to the Court in their charge. When the case came to be remanded the Assessor marked the charge sheet "Children to go to the Door of Hope prison" and instructed the police to take them there. Mr. Kuan, however, wished to keep the children in the Mixed Court cells, and gave his orders to the runners to take them away. The runners went to remove the children but the police, under instructions from their cadet officer, Mr. Fenton, refused to give them up. There was some bustling and one of the runners struck Inspector Gibson in the eye. This started a general fight, in which the police were victorious and carried off the children and prisoners to their vans in the yard.

During the fight Mr. King, the assistant magistrate, was heard shouting from the Bench to the native municipal constables and detectives in Chinese, that they were Chinese subjects and if they resisted the magistrate's orders they would be severely punished. The native constables, however, appear to have considered their first duty lay to their employers.

The riot was sufficiently serious to induce Mr. Fenton to go to the telephone to send a message for reinforcements. He had used the instrument an hour before and it was then all right, but now the mouthpiece was nowhere to be found. This may have been a coincidence merely. At all events it did not render the telephone unusable. The gates of the compound leading into the road were, however, shut and locked. The magistrate, assistant magistrate, and assessor were then standing in the middle of the Court. Mr. Fenton went to ask that the gates be opened to allow the vans to go out, whereupon the magistrate turned on him in a perfect fury, and told him that he might break the gates open, and destroy the Court itself. "You may trample on my body," he added, and then strode away. The gates were subsequently opened, and the children removed. The sitting of the Court had, of course, been abruptly suspended.

It had been arranged to set apart this morning (yesterday) for the trial of the case, but it is at least doubtful if it will proceed to-day.

So far as is known the only casualties in the fight were sustained by Insp. Gibson and a runner, both of whom were slightly damaged.

The incident caused great excitement yesterday both in foreign and native circles. We learn that a meeting of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce is called for this morning, and that several of the principal guilds are also to hold meetings to protest against the treatment sustained by the Chinese magistrates. A wild statement is being industriously circulated that Mr. King was hit over the head by one of the police.

The North-China Daily News commenting editorially on the case, said:—

The question is now assuming a wider phase; it practically amounts to the question whether the Settlement shall be administered as a Chinese centre under Chinese authority, or whether it shall continue to be a Settlement for the Foreign Community of Shanghai. No one benefits more by the maintenance of the latter condition than do the law-abiding Chinese in the Settlement, as the enormous number of those now living under our protection shows; and all intelligent and progressive Chinese must feel that the action taken by the Consular Body and the Municipal Council for the better protection of life and the better treatment of native prisoners, is fully deserving of their sympathy and support. So fully do they recognise the fairness and thoroughness of the protection extended to them by the Municipal Council, that they have never moved to have such a change in the Land Regulations made as would admit of one or more Chinese being admitted to the Council as members, though more than once some self-constituted champion has done it for them but, of course, in vain. The police in the present case, it must be remembered, were acting under the instruction of the British assessor, who will, of course, be upheld by his Consul-General and the Consular Body, who are all deeply interested in the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the International Settlement. The wave of exaltation that has come over the Chinese since Japan so easily defeated the big Power which has fascinated China for years, as the python does the rabbit, must be checked before it becomes dangerous as it may easily become if we wait for the ebb to come, as no doubt it will do. Meanwhile, our remonstrances have to be addressed to the Taotai and to his superior, the Viceroy; the Mixed Court magistrates are merely instruments, whose position obliges them to carry out strictly the orders they receive from above. But Mr. King, if the reports are true, should show better results of his three years course at King's College, London.

It is notorious that Shanghai has for years been in a state of smouldering dissatisfaction on the part of the Chinese and there are good reasons to doubt whether the progress of time and the changes it brings with it ought not to have led to some change in a system which, when all is said and done, can not possibly be satisfactory to any intelligent Chinese. But recourse to outrage and violence will not inure to the benefit of the Chinese, where they stand alone on one side and the whole Occident is ranged against them on the other. The fact that Japanese subjects are not molested means nothing. The Japanese Authorities will unquestionably cooperate with Europe and America in restoring security for foreign life and property. Already the Japanese Consul has telegraphed for the assistance of a man-of-war, and if tranquillity and good order are not restored before its arrival, Japanese marines will fall into line with the 400 British blue-jackets and 300 Italians who are reported to have already landed.

The Fiji Shimpoo's correspondent, confirmed by the Asahi's, says that bands of British marines are parading the streets and that German marines also have been landed from a gun-boat to cooperate with the German volunteers. There appears to be a general strike and the strikers are said to be directing their fury mainly against jinrikisha, bicycles and motor-cars. Dr. Macleod is reported to have been wounded, as have also been another foreigner and one Chinaman, but whether the latter suffered at the hands of the rioters or was himself a rioter we do not distinctly learn.

The Hochi Shimbun's news is very explicit as to the cause of the disturbance. It attributes it to the Mixed-Court question. On the 17th, it says, a monster meeting of Chinese residents was held, and a resolution was universally adopted to cease all business pending a settlement of that question. Thus a universal strike was inaugurated and the lower orders took advantage of it to commit excesses.

Wednesday, December 20.

Telegrams from Shanghai indicate that order has been in the main restored by the efforts of the police, the marines and the volunteers. Twenty Chinese subjects are said to have been killed, but on the foreign side there were no fatal casualties; only a few hurts more or less trivial. The damage to property also is slight. A police station was half destroyed by fire; a grog-shop was wrecked, and a jinrikisha store was partially looted. On the night of the 18th the streets were deserted, except that armed guards patrolled them. On the 19th there were signs that trouble might at any moment break out afresh. Many loafers were seen here and there, and though business had been resumed a feeling of uneasiness prevailed. H.M.S. Diadem was expected to land 500 marines on that day, and the U.S.S. Baltimore, it was thought, would take a similar step. The local Chinese newspapers attribute the emente to roughs who took advantage of the Mixed-Court incident to raise a disturbance, their intention being to loot the foreign settlement.

On the morning of the 19th instant the Foreign Consuls held a meeting and received from the Taotai a communication that unless the British assessor and the police cadet were dismissed from office, the Mixed Court would not be again opened and further riots would certainly take place. It is alleged that the Waiwupu has telegraphed to the Taotai, directing him to preserve order. A Japanese war-ship and an Austrian were expected. With regard to the former, we may here state that the gun-boat Uji left Kure on the 18th instant for Shanghai, and that the cruiser Tsushima left Saseho on the 19th for the same place. The Fiji's correspondent states that unless the foreign guards be withdrawn a fresh disturbance will take place, but we are inclined to think that a telegraph clerk has mutilated this message, for the Chinese have never shown more disposition than other people to riot in defiance of an armed force.

A German war-ship reached Shanghai on the 19th, so that by this time there seem to be two British vessels, two Japanese, one American, one Austrian and one German, all lying at Woosung or Shanghai. The Germans are also said to be sending a military force from Kiaochow, and are further despatching to the Yangtze their squadron from Manila.

An official report does not confirm the statement that no foreigner has been killed. It mentions the death of one Sikh constable among the casualties. It also speaks of a rumour that the main pipe of the water-works is in danger. Another point of some importance indicated by this official report and confirmed by the Hochi Shimbun's correspondent is that several Japanese subjects were wounded. It will be remembered that the original statements pointedly excepted the Japanese from the list of nationalities towards whom animosity was shown. The Hochi's correspondent further alleges that the German Consul is among the wounded. That probably accounts for the marked activity shown by the Germans.

There can be little doubt that this affair will lead to troublesome diplomatic complications, through we do not anticipate any serious result.

The latest account puts the United States Consul among the wounded, and gives the number of police-stations burned as three not one. It is rumoured that some 1,500 Chinese soldiers are among the rioters, but inasmuch as they are said to have worn civilian costume it is hard to see how they can have been identified. The Chinese inhabitants of the place are acquitted of taking any part in the disturbance, but that also is scarcely to be accepted without reserve, for they certainly held a meeting to denounce the Mixed Court affair. Unquestionably they were well within their rights in doing so, but their attitude must have encouraged the roughs.

The Shanghai newspapers received by the French Mail on Wednesday gave abundant proof that a storm was brewing, though the N. C. Daily News was inclined to take optimistic views. For instance, on December 13, it wrote:—

Although native opinion is still highly excited over the affair in the Mixed Court and the most extravagant and anti-foreign sentiments are being expressed, the tension between the Chinese and Consular authorities is somewhat relaxed. The Consular body met yesterday to discuss the dispatches from the Taotai, and the proceedings have not, of course, been divulged. But it appears to be generally understood that the immediate crisis has been avoided and that negotiations may be set on foot which will result in a complete understanding in regard to Mixed Court procedure. We are authorised to deny most emphatically the ridiculous statement set about yesterday that dispatches from Sir Pelham Warren to the Taotai had been returned unopened, and that the Taotai's dispatches had also been returned to him. Last night it became known that an organised run on the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank is being planned for to-day, when as many notes as possible are to be presented for redemption in silver dollars. It is even asserted that the co-operation of one of the smaller foreign banks has been secured in this manoeuvre, which cannot, however, do more than possibly cause a temporary inconvenience to trade. The Bank will easily make arrangements to meet any such run, and in so doing might, in return, seriously inconvenience the native banks.

Referring to the fracas in the Mixed Court our contemporary says, in answer to some criticisms by a Chinese newspaper:—

Are the Taotai's orders to over-ride the orders of the Consular Body in the International Settlement? The Consular Body have instructed the foreign assessors that female prisoners on remand are to be sent to the Municipal goal, where there is a proper women's ward under feminine supervision. The Taotai has instructed the magistrate that they are to be put in the Mixed Court cells. The British assessor and the police were doing their duty in carrying out the instructions of the Consular Body, and the magistrates were doing what they thought was their duty. The "outrage," as our contemporary calls it, arose through the magistrate's runners attacking the police. Meanwhile, a correspondent who has had a long experience in China, and knows the subject thoroughly, writes: "It may help in the understanding of this Mixed Court affair if you realise the fact that the Mixed Court, as well as every native Court in China, is 'run' by the 'runners.' For some years the Mixed Court 'runners' have groaned over the losses to them by the Municipal care of prisoners, and in cases involving dealings in females they get their best harvest."

A meeting of Shanghai merchants and gentry is said to have presented the following proposals to the Taotai:—

- (1)—Since the Chinese residents in the International Settlement are holders of a large part of the real estate, they should be represented in the Municipal Council by a Chinese member or members.
- (2)—Since Mr. Twyman has shown by his action a lack of knowledge of the treaties, he should be replaced by another assessor.
- (3)—The police inspectors participating in the riot should be removed.
- (4)—The police constables, who are also guilty of violence must be punished.
- (5)—In the future, all cases must be decided according to the regulations, i.e., the magistrates are to enjoy full powers in purely Chinese cases. The female wards in the municipal goal are to be abolished.

On December 15th the following note was printed in the N. C. Daily News:—

Mrs. Li Wang-shih, and the other prisoners, whose detention by the Police has been the pretext of the recent trouble concerning the Mixed Court, were released yesterday afternoon. Instructions to that effect reached the Municipal authorities from the Consular Body. The fifteen female children who had been cared for in the meantime at the Door of Hope were handed back to Mrs. Li and her companions.

Our contemporary regrets this decision and said that the Diplomatic Body, "unmindful of the experience of more than sixty years" has given way to Chinese popular clamour. It concludes its article in these words:—

The relations between foreigners and Chinese in the Settlements have gone on with almost perfect harmony for some sixty years, and it is a great pity that this harmony should be interrupted now over a question of no real importance whatever. But Young China, its head turned by the result of indigestion of the Western learning it has acquired, and believing itself fully competent at once to lead its country along the path Japan has trodden so bravely, has so far impressed its views and aspirations on the country that it wants to do away instantly, or as instantly as possible, with such checks as extraterritoriality and foreign Settlements. No one has sympathised more heartily than we have with the movement throughout China in favour of the introduction of Western knowledge and civilisation, but before extraterritoriality can be abolished, and their privileges be removed from the foreign Settlements and concessions, China must pass through the probation to which Japan devoted herself, and it is hard to see where in China are the Ito and Inouyes, and the other statesmen who led Japan into the promised land.

Thursday, December 21.

It was known in Shanghai on the 15th instant that the Foreign Corps Diplomatique, acting in deference to representations made by the Waiwupu, had instructed the Municipal authorities to surrender the Chinese woman held in custody by them. But it was on the 18th that the rioting took place. How is this to be explained? Are we to assume that in spite of having gained their point the Chinese engaged in a wanton display of violence, or was there some other cause? The former theory is very difficult to entertain and the latter obliges us to fall back on conjecture. There is some missing link in the story, and we must await further intelligence before forming a definite opinion as to the proximate origin of the riot.

But concerning the decision of the Corps Diplomatique in Peking, it could scarcely have been other than it was. The relation of the Shanghai Municipality to this matter was purely humanitarian. Foreign interests were not concerned in the case at all. The woman, a Chinese, was charged with kidnapping Chinese girls for the purpose of taking them to Canton where she intended to sell them for service in the Flower Boats. It had been common to send Chinese male prisoners on remand to the Municipal goal pending final trial, but there had not been any instance of a Chinese woman being so sent. The foreign Consuls claim that this difference was one not of principle but of convenience. Proper accommodation for women did not exist in the Municipal goal and consequently they were not sent there. Recently, however, such accommodation had been provided, and therefore the British assessor adopted with regard to women the same course as had been previously followed with regard to men. Nevertheless though precedent may have been on the side of the Municipality, right was not, for were the rules of the Mixed Court strictly followed, all Chinese offenders would be detained in custody, not by the foreign Municipal Authorities, but by the Magistrate of the Mixed Court. We do not know exactly why a departure from the rule was made originally, but probably the habit of using the Municipal goal had its origin in a question of superior accommodation. Be that as it may the British Assessor is credited with having been influenced solely by humane instincts when he ordered the woman to be removed to the Municipal goal and the girls to the Door of Hope. He had no right to do so other than the sanction of benevolent intention. If the Chinese saw things in the same light as the Foreign Consuls and the Municipal Authorities see them they might be thankful for this exercise of benevolence. But they do not so see them. They prefer that women of Chinese nationality should be kept in custody by Chinese jailors, and they are entitled to their preference. How then could the Corps Diplomatique in Peking have decided otherwise than it did? We may wish that it could have decided otherwise but we can not deny the justice of its ruling.

There has passed between the Shanghai Taotai and the Senior Consul, Dr. Knappe, a correspondence, to one portion of which attention should be drawn. The Taotai's despatch to Dr. Knappe is formal but quite courteous. Dr. Knappe in his reply uses this language:—"It is evident by your conduct in this matter as well as in many others, that your principle is obstruction to any progress in the interest of humanity." Now just imagine that the cases were reversed and that the Taotai employed such language to Dr. Knappe. Would there not be a vehement and justly vehement outcry against the intolerable insolence of the Chinese? Assuredly there would, and assuredly no foreign Consul is justified in treating a high Chinese official with such rudeness. If Dr. Knappe supposed that the force of his remark would be lost upon the Taotai, then he formulated it futilely. If he supposed, as he certainly did suppose, that it would be understood and appreciated, then he showed a want of politeness which he would bitterly resent were he himself the victim of it. These are the incidents that rankle in Chinese bosoms, and by constant repetition create a feeling of resentment which occasionally finds violent expression when the proximate cause is comparatively insignificant. The Chinese are not blameless; very far from it. But it is our opinion that gradually in the course of years of intercourse foreigners have laid in China a train of gunpowder which is now beginning to constitute a serious danger. Unfortunately, too, things have begun to travel in a vicious circle. The Japanese succeeded in asserting themselves and in winning a measure of foreign respect before their own umbrage had grown so profound as to make it dangerous to trust them. The Chinese have not so succeeded, and in the meanwhile have learned to feel so keenly that every renewed slight at foreign hands augments their moral unfitness for the only remedy which can be really efficacious. Officials in positions so conspicuous as that occupied by Dr. Knappe might advantageously take a less superficial view of their responsibilities and refrain from sowing the wind among a nation of 400 millions of people.

The latest news is that the Foreign Consuls have telegraphed the Viceroy at Nanking and the Foreign Corps Diplomatique in Peking, urging the adoption of speedy and effective measures to restore order, and that the Viceroy has instructed the Shanghai Taotai to adopt such measures.

The Japanese war-ships Tsushima and Uji were to arrive in the Yangtze on the 20th.

It appears that the Shanghai correspondent of The Times has wired in the sense that no Japanese subjects were molested in the riot and that, on the contrary, the Japanese seemed to be on good terms with the rioters. He suggests that the Japanese Government should address to Peking a remonstrance against the anti-foreign feeling now prevalent in China. It may be taken for granted that Japan will not abet her neighbour in any folly such as an attempt to expel foreigners or to recover judicial autonomy without duly qualifying to exercise it. As to the relation between the rioters and the Japanese residents, there seems to be some mistake, seeing that the news received in Tokyo speaks of several Japanese having been injured.

It is contradicted that either German or British troops have been ordered to Shanghai.

The Nichi Nichi's correspondent, wiring under date of the 19th, says that the Ningpo population of Shanghai is chiefly responsible for the disturbance. He speaks of some 20 foreigners having been killed or wounded. A telegram to the Fiji Shimpō dated the 20th alleges that order has been completely restored and that everything has resumed its normal aspect except that marines and volunteers patrol the streets. The Viceroy at Nanking has received instructions to proceed to Shanghai for purposes of investigation, and it is expected that the Mixed Court will be at once reopened. Apparently the Taotai has hitherto been apprehensive of renewed disorder if he re-opened the Court. He is said to be insisting on the removal of the British assessor from office.

POLITICAL NOTES.

Wednesday, December 20.

Tokyo is full of rumours as to the resignation of the Cabinet. These rumours have been brought to the surface by a lengthy meeting which took place on the 18th instant between Count Katsura and Marquis Saionji at the former's official residence. It is alleged that the Premier signified by telephone his intention of calling on the Marquis but the latter replied that he would repair to the Nagata-cho residence. The conference between the two statesmen lasted some three hours, and after they had lunched together Count Katsura proceeded to the Palace and Marquis Saionji repaired to the house of Marquis Ito. Subsequently the Seiyū-kai leader returned home, where he presently invited Messrs. Matsuda Masahisa and Hara Kei to a consultation. The general impression is that Count Katsura waited to resign until the conclusion of the Peking Conference.

The Asahi Shimbun alleges that the Premier's original intention was to approach Marquis Saionji through Marquis Ito, but the latter recommended direct conference, and immediately on receiving from Baron Komura a telegram that the Peking conference had concluded, Count Katsura opened negotiations with the Seiyū-kai leader.

Assuming the correctness of the report that Count Katsura is about to hand over the Ministerial reins to Marquis Saionji, the great question is, will the Marquis endeavour to effect a coalition with the Progressists, or will he stand alone with the Seiyū-kai behind him, or will he desire that a section of the present Ministry should remain in office to assist him. No one competent to speak with any authority ventures to give a definite opinion on this point.

The Fiji Shimpō alleges that Marquis Saionji shows unwillingness to accept the responsibility.

Thursday, December 21.

On the 20th instant the Hochi Shimbun issued an extra giving, with all semblance of confidence, an account of the interview between Count Katsura and Marquis Saionji. In this account the Prime Minister is represented as having had no expectation whatever that Marquis Saionji would consent to form a Cabinet. His Excellency's idea in meeting the Seiyū-kai leader, we are told, was that the latter would refuse to take over the reins and might then be reasonably pressed to give his support to the present Ministry. But the Marquis defeated this project by assenting, and the Premier was depicted as intensely chagrined. The Hochi Shimbun is an organ of the Progressists. It is the property of a well known politician. Yet it lends its columns to the publication of such silly falsehoods. It seems to be as reckless of truth as the Yokohama Anglo-German journal which persists in falsely alleging that two members of the Korean Cabinet which was in power at the time of the conclusion of the last convention, subsequently committed suicide.

The general impression is that Marquis Saionji has definitely agreed to form a Cabinet. Count Katsura proposed to him the arrangement and Marquises Ito and Yamagata endorsed the project. After the meeting of the Privy Council on the 20th, Marquis Ito and Count Katsura lunched at the Palace, and it is believed that the Emperor then sanctioned the proposed change. The question of chief interest is whether the new Cabinet will be taken solely from the ranks of the Seiyū-kai, thus being purely a one-party Cabinet, or whether it will be composed of Seiyū-kai and Progressist politicians, the former in a majority; or whether some of its portfolios will be given to the conservative statesmen. All this being quite uncertain, little confidence can be placed in forecasts as to the new Ministerial slate. One prediction advanced with assurance, is that Mr. Kato Takaaki will be Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron Suye-matsu of Home Affairs, Mr. Matsuda Masahisa of Finance, Mr. Hara Kei of Communications, Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku of Education and Mr. Oishi Masami of Agriculture and Commerce, the portfolios of the Army and the Navy remaining unchanged. The Fiji Shimpō's conviction is that several days must pass before the composition of the new Ministry can be finally determined. We may mention that in view of the Ministry's imminent resignation the Fiji adopts a greatly changed tone towards the Cabinet. Our contemporary says, in effect, that whatever errors the Ministry has made will now be swallowed up in the memory of its great achievements and that a crown of glory will permanently rest on its head. The Fiji further strongly controverts the notion prevalent in some quarters that the Cabinet has no real intention of resigning, and is merely making a pretence of doing so in order to embarrass its adversaries. The answer to such an accusation is furnished by the fact that Count Katsura did not appoint any successors to Viscount Yoshikawa and Baron Kubota, but left the chairs of Home Affairs and of Education to be temporarily filled by other members of the Ministry. Unquestionably Count Katsura is resolved to go out of office, but he does not seek to create an embarrassing situation by any precipitate action.

MR. SAKATANI ON JAPANESE FINANCE.

Speaking before the Kokka-gakkai on the 14th instant, Mr. Sakatani took for text the recently published Budget. The cardinal object kept in view by the compilers of the document, he said, was to adjust the national debt so as to maintain credit abroad. The confidence of foreign lenders depends largely on the market price commanded by bonds. Thus if bonds issued at 90 are commanding 92, they offer a good investment, being easily placed as security for accommodation. Exchange business in Japan can not be said to have yet reached a complete state of development. In Europe and America the bourses are such powerful organizations that one can handle any sum in stocks immediately. There is a possibility of buying or selling on a large scale without delay. But it is not so in Japan, where the market has to be nursed and where any extensive transaction at once influences prices, and perhaps can not be put through at all. Hence in London the exchange quotations mean a tangible and practical fact. The Japanese Government feels that in view of the many undertakings which will offer themselves in the sequel of the war, it is of prime importance that stores of foreign capital should be accessible, and since that can be achieved only by keeping up the credit of the country's securities, special importance was attached to the latter point by the framers of the Budget. Concerning these undertakings, Mr. Sakatani instanced railways and harbours at home, railways and mines in Korea and Manchuria and so forth. For these various purposes foreign money is obviously needed, at all events until the enterprises begin to pay. The Vice-Minister further explained that another motive in forming the Budget was the replacement of high-interest-bearing loans by low, which the Government considered a wiser method—at any rate in respect of immediate application—for reducing the national burdens than to cut down taxation.

CAPTURES OF VESSELS.

According to official statistics extending up to the 16th instant, the figures relating to vessels captured by the Japanese are as follows:—

KOREA.

Friday, December 15.

Mr. Hulbert, whose visit to the United States on account of ill-health was well understood by those behind the scenes, is reported by telegram to have addressed to President Roosevelt a remonstrance, said to emanate from the Korean Emperor, in the sense that the new convention was concluded by force and that it ought not to receive the approval of the United States Government.

The Kokumin Shinbun believes that the Emperor of Korea never issued such instructions and that Mr. Hulbert is the conscious or unconscious agent of political intriguers. Of course the Japanese Government will demand from the Korean Court an explicit statement whether such attempts to misrepresent the situation have its sanction. It was the Emperor himself who, after hearing Marquis Ito's arguments, instructed his Ministers to conclude the convention, and the Minister who signed the document is now Premier, actively assisting in giving effect to its provisions. Had the Emperor refused to conclude such a convention and defied Japan to compel him, there would not have been wanting persons to sympathise with him and to accredit him with some measure of patriotic courage. But that, having agreed to the convention with merely a show of reluctance, he should then endeavour to purchase pity by pleading force majeure, is a proceeding too paltry to be believed of His Majesty, and we shall not believe it without very strong confirmation.

The Korean Budget for next year is published by the Asahi Shinbun, namely:—

	yen.
Revenue	7,484,744
Expenditure	7,967,288
Excess of Expenditure	482,644

Our contemporary says that the expenditures include outlays on account of the Foreign Office in Seoul and the Korean Legations abroad. These items will be retrenched. A notable feature, however, is that the allowances for the Imperial Household have been nearly doubled. The appropriation was 1,070,359 yen (old currency) last year, and this year it is 1,300,000 yen (new currency).

Li Wan-yong, Minister of Justice, having memorialized the Throne, at the suggestion of Mr. Stevens, advocating the recall of the Korean Representatives from foreign countries, it is expected that the step will soon be taken.

The new Convention has been published in the Korea Official Gazette.

Mr. Pak Che-soon, though he has emerged from hospital, finds his health too much broken to permit his continuance in office. He is expected to resign, and Mr. Li Wan-yong is spoken of as his probable successor.

Saturday, December 16.

The German Representative has left Seoul and the Representative of France alone remains.

The Korean Emperor has issued instructions for the withdrawal of all the Korean Legations in foreign countries.

A recent telegram said that the new Convention was to have been published on the 15th instant, but some delay seems to have taken place.

The Il Ching-hoi have addressed to the Government a memorial urging the publication of the new Convention throughout the whole country; the abolition of the Foreign Office in Seoul; the recall of the Korean Ministers abroad; the punishment of officials who, by way of protest against the Convention, absent themselves from their duty; and the firmer establishment of the present Cabinet. If the Government takes these steps the Il Ching-hoi promise to support it.

The Kokumin Shinbun writes editorially condemning the action said to have been taken in Washington by the Korean Representative to France and by Mr. Hulbert. These two gentlemen have endeavoured to procure the intervention of the United States. They are apparently engaged in an attempt to radically modify the relations established between Japan and Korea and recognised by the world. It is impossible to devise any course more inimical to Korea's best interests. The end of such procedure, if resolutely pursued, must be altogether fatal to Korea as a Sovereign State. The most superficial student of the time should appreciate this. The Kokumin speaks with the utmost plainness.

Sunday, December 17.

There are fresh disturbances in Chhung-chong. They are said to be a recrudescence of the recent emeute.

The new Convention was published in the Official Gazette of Seoul on the 16th instant. There has been an attempt to murder a Japanese post-master at Kang-ju in southern Pyong-sang-do. A Korean employee stabbed the postmaster in the neck and then cut his own throat. The postmaster's wound is not mortal. It is suspected that this incident was connected with a disturbance at a place called Yong-san.

Monday, December 18.

Major Nozu, military adviser to the Korean Government, is said to have recommended that no superannuated Korean officers should be employed and that their places should be taken by Koreans who have graduated at Japanese military colleges.

Liu, captain of the Wi-pyong (righteous army) has distributed inflammatory circulars at Hwanghai and in other places, and is said to be on his way to Seoul at the head of several hundreds of his men, for the purpose of presenting a petition. Nothing is said as to the purport of the circulars or the petition.

Chinju, in Kyongsan-do, also shows signs of unrest. Thirty Japanese gendarmes have been sent thither from Seoul.

Out of the 120 men arrested in connexion with the recent disturbances in Seoul, 11 have been convicted, but it is expected that very lenient treatment will be meted out to them.

Two Korean students have returned to Seoul with a complaint that higher education is not permitted to Koreans studying in Japan. The two youths have communicated this assertion to the press and are urging the propriety of a general strike on the part of the students by way of protest.

A police school is to be established in Seoul.

It is stated that the Korean Cabinet has arranged with Japan for a loan of 1½ million yen without interest or security. This money is to be employed for the purpose of relieving the great tightness now existing in the Korean money market.

The Korean Foreign Office will not be abolished until the Ministers and Consuls serving abroad have all been recalled and the affairs of the Department have been finally wound up.

Tuesday, December 19.

The Japanese Privy Council was to assemble yesterday for the purpose of discussing the organization of the residency-general in Seoul. It was expected that the result would be immediately promulgated.

All reports point to Marquis Ito as the first Resident-General. Baron Kodama was much spoken of, but the distinguished General and statesman is resolved to return to his post in Formosa. He evidently wishes to complete the work he has so admirably directed hitherto.

Wednesday, December 20.

The French Legation is to be withdrawn from Seoul. It is stated that official intimations have now been received from the Governments of Great Britain, the United States, Germany, France, Russia and China, in the sense that they definitely withdraw their Legations from Korea, and entrust to their Representatives in Tokyo the duty of safeguarding the lives and properties of their subjects and citizens in the peninsular empire.

The very confident statement made on the 19th instant in Tokyo to the effect that a meeting of the Privy Council was to be held on that day, proves to have been incorrect. It was understood that the purpose of the meeting was to consider the arrangements for establishing a residency general in Seoul, but the meeting was ultimately postponed until the 20th. This postponement does not, however, affect the fact, now generally credited, that Marquis Ito is to be the first Resident General.

Rumour says that the system adopted with regard to Korea will be to divide the Resident-General's office into three sections; that of finance (zaiser), that of police (keimu) and that of communications (isushin). There will be, under the Resident-General, a Chief of Affairs (Somuchokan), which office is expected to be given either to Mr. Hayashi or to Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku; there will be three Section Chiefs (Bucho), taking charge of the three bureaux mentioned above; and there will be several Residents, as arranged by the new Convention. Mr. Megata will be the Zaiseibu-cho; Mr. Maruyama will be the Keimubu-cho, and the Isushibu-cho remains unindicated by rumour. The Advisers, hitherto officiating in the Government, will henceforth be attached to the Tokan-fu. Such is said to be the system submitted for the Privy Council's consideration.

Thursday, December 21.

It has been decided that Mr. Megata shall succeed to the control of the Customs.

The Chhinju rioters have subsided into tranquillity without any further disturbance.

Seoul has received definite news of Marquis Ito's pending appointment to the post of Resident-General. It is believed there that Mr. Hayashi will be transferred to a European Embassy as Secretary.

The Privy Council on the 20th instant debated the draft of a law for organizing the new system in Korea. It is stated that the law was adopted in its entirety. The members of the Privy Council and Princes Arisugawa and Kanin as well as some of the members of Marquis Ito's suite on the occasion of his recent visit to Seoul, had subsequently the honour of lunching at the Palace.

THE CHINESE STUDENTS.

Saturday, December 16.

Telegrams from Peking indicate that Chinese high officials do not at all sympathize with the conduct of the students in Tokyo. Viceroy Yuan and Mr. Tung Ching have expressed very strong views on the subject and have declared that they do not doubt the ability and determination of the Japanese Authorities to deal suitably with the matter. There is a rumour that Mr. Yang, Chinese Representative in Tokyo, has wired to Peking in the sense that some of the students are about to return to China where they will engage in a political plot, and that the Peking Government instructed him to urge the Japanese authorities to apprehend the leaders in this movement.

In the meanwhile we have a very interesting statement made by the Chinese Representative to a committee of the Progressists. His Excellency said that the regulations which are supposed to be responsible for all the trouble were submitted to him by the Japanese Educational Authorities before final enactment. He saw nothing objectionable in them, but he thought it wise to consult the students themselves. These expressed approval of the regulations on the whole, but desired that Articles 9 and 10 should be deleted. (Art. 9 relates to the selection and control of boarding-houses; Art. 10 provides that a student expelled from one of the selected schools for bad conduct may not be received into any of the others). Before, however, Mr. Yang could communicate the views of the students to the Department of Education the regulations were promulgated. He regretted that his communication had been anticipated, but he attached little importance to the affair as the students' objections were so limited. Further, his opinion is that the great commotion now made by the students partakes of a political nature. But since the thing is happening within the territory of a foreign State where Chinese laws do not apply, there is no manner of dealing with it so far as he is concerned.

The same committee has obtained a statement from the Department of Education. It is on the lines of accounts already published in these columns: namely, that the students have radically misconceived the purport of the new regulations, mistaking for undue interference what is really essential in the interests of the students themselves. The Department has taken pains to make the true import of the legislation quite clear but the students remain obdurate and there is now nothing for it but to let things take their course.

Mr. Sawayanagi, Chief of the Gakumu Kyoku in the Department of Education, has given (Nichi Nichi Shimbun) an explanation which shows that the enactment of the new Regulations was a necessity. Not only had the Chinese students fallen into a habit of passing from one school to another without observance of any formalities, to the very great inconvenience and embarrassment of the schools, but also some of them had fallen into a mode of life which was at once fatal to their own careers and calculated to corrupt the morals of the Japanese student class while, at the same time, reflecting on the fair fame of this country. The regulations themselves were perfectly free from the faults attributed to them, and any earnest student should have welcomed them rather than attacked them. An impression seemed to prevail in certain quarters that the Regulations had been enacted by desire of the Chinese Government. There was no truth whatever in such an idea. The Japanese Authorities had acted solely on their own discretion. They might have allowed matters to drift, but they felt that this question of the educational facilities afforded by Japan to students from the neighbouring empire had international importance, and, besides, Japan might be said to have invited the students in the first place.

Meanwhile the students remain on strike. It is now alleged that the section consisting of students attending Government Schools were not originally disposed to join the strike, but they were intimidated into doing so by the emissaries of an association organized by students from the South of China. These called themselves the Kan-shu-kai (Morituri Society) and selected what they called Kusatsu (detectives), whose chief duty was to go from lodging-house to lodging-house, inciting their comrades and threatening with death any that refused to join or declined to return home rather than submit to the new Regulations.

The Nippon, in an exhaustive analysis of the motives of the students, an analysis which appears to be mainly conjectural, mentions one interesting point, namely, that among the students there is a considerable number whose attention is devoted to revolutionary projects rather than to the acquisition of learning. These men seek opportunities to make trouble, and they think that they have found such an opportunity in regulations which they believe to be inspired by the Chinese Government.

Monday, December 18.

It is stated that Viceroy Chang-Chia-tung advocates recourse to very strong measures in dealing with the Chinese students in Tokyo, and that a similar view is taken by the Peking Government. There appears to be an impression that Mr. Yang, the Chinese Representative in Japan, is showing too lenient an attitude towards the commotion, but nothing is easier than to form such an impression. It is one thing to judge these incidents from a distance and quite another to deal with them at first hand.

Meanwhile there is some appearance of this troublesome matter being amicably settled. The leaders of the Chinese students are said to have conceived that although the Government has adopted what they consider an objectionable method of treatment, the Japanese nation, as represented by the Diet, would not approve of such legislation. Therefore they desire to appeal to the political parties, and the latter are not unwilling to exert themselves in the interests of a peaceful arrangement. Already a meeting has taken place between delegates of the students and members of the Progressists, which Party, in view of its close relations with Count Okuma and consequently with the Waseda College where so many of the Chinese students receive education, is naturally desirous of restoring things to their old footing so far as peace and quiet are concerned. The delegates of the Chinese students are said to have explained at the meeting that they do not profess to be fundamentally disposed to obey the present Chinese Government, but nevertheless they have no connexion whatever with the so-called Reform Party, namely, the party under the leadership of Kang Yu-wei and Sung I-sen. They further stated that were they asked to submit to regulations universally applicable, whether to foreigners studying in Japan or to Japanese students, they would have no hesitation in according their consent, but they could not possibly submit to be discriminated against.

We do not learn what reply the members of the Progressists made to this announcement, but it may be well to explain that the complaint of discrimination has a foundation so slight as to be quite inappreciable from a practical point of view. All Japanese students have to furnish sureties when they enter a school included on the list of officially sanctioned institutions. All such Japanese students have to inscribe their names in the school register, and all such students, if they live in boarding-houses, must be guided by the indication of the authorities and must submit to the latter's system of inspection. So far then as Japanese students are concerned, no discrimination whatever appears to have been exercised against the Chinese by the new regulations. But foreigners have not yet been brought within the purview of such regulations. There has not hitherto been any occasion to legislate in the case of foreigners attending Japanese schools, the matter not having entered the field of practical jurisprudence. Thus the complaint of the Chinese is limited to the fact that they are the pioneer victims—if such an expression be permissible—of the new system. The best way to answer that objection would be to declare the system applicable to all aliens seeking educational privileges in Japan.

Three of the Chinese students waited upon Mr. Sawayanagi, of the Education Department. They were accompanied by an interpreter. Mr. Sawayanagi gave them an interview at once, but he must have learned with much surprise that they had come, not to discuss the pending complication in any way, but merely to bid him farewell as they were about to return to China. Considering that he had never seen these three youths previously, Mr. Sawayanagi naturally replied that he failed to understand why they had come on such an errand. As to the trouble between the students and the authorities, it was due, in his opinion, solely to misunderstanding, genuine or intentional, on the part of the students. If they could not submit to rules which the Japanese Government considered essential in the interests alike of sound instruction and of good morals, they might go home to China. There was no help for it. Their return under such circumstances would not in any way impair the relations between China and Japan. If, unfortunately, it did affect those relations, then the only inference must be that China was not a nation whose friendship need be courted.

Tuesday, December 19.

There has been a meeting between representatives of the students and representatives of the Japanese press, and it is thought that a pacifying effect has been produced. The Educational Authorities have also taken thoroughly comprehensive steps to explain to the students the true import of the new regulations and to show that there is no intention of discriminating against the Chinese. With regard to the rule requiring that each student shall be provided with a certificate from the Chinese Minister, it is pointed out that any one duly delegated by the Minister may sign such a certificate; and with regard to the control of lodging-houses the Nichi Nichi Shimbun claims that the Government has made some concession, but we can not discover any clear evidence of the latter fact. So far as published accounts indicate, the Educational Authorities have merely indicated that Chinese students are under no obligation to take their quarters in lodging-houses; they may have houses or establishments of their own. If, however, they attend the schools specially selected and licensed by the Government and if they do not set up housekeeping on their own account, then they must have their quarters in the designated lodging-houses. If, on the contrary, they frequent other schools, then they may go to what lodging-houses they please.

Wednesday, December 20.

It appears that Viceroy Yuan is disposed to grant short shrift to the recalcitrant Chinese students in Tokyo. He is represented (Nichi Nichi's telegrams) as having addressed to the various provincial authorities an intimation that the conduct of these students is intolerable. They rebel against the judicious and kindly efforts of the Japanese educational authorities, and they conspire to overthrow the Manchu Dynasty. Such youths must be severely dealt with, and if any of them, abandoning their studies, return to China, the local officials are to apprehend and subject them to strict examination by way of preliminary to suitable punishment.

We know what is involved in strict judicial examination à la Chinoise.

Meanwhile a deputation of the Chinese students have waited on the standing committee of the Seiyun-kai, and, setting forth their grievances, have asked the Party to assist in bringing about the rescinding of the new rules. They received the answer that might have been expected, namely, a promise to investigate the matter.

The Jiji Shimpō says that the agitation among the students is subsiding, but they still absent themselves from school and college, and, true to the old Confucian saying "the small man when idle becomes an evil-doer" (shōjin kankyo fusen wo nasu) they are indulging in all kinds of dissipation. Some of them are said to have so far lost themselves that, under any circumstances, their re-admission to the schools is a doubtful question. Two hundred left Yokohama by the French mail last Saturday. If Viceroy Yuan's instructions be carried out, these misguided youths will have a rough reception when they reach their native country. They are veritably between the devil and the deep blue sea.

REPORT OF THE WAR FINANCES INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE

In March 1904 the Associated Banks of the Tokyo Clearing House appointed a committee of 10 to investigate the question of war finance as it unfolded itself. This Committee presented its complete report on the 15th of November 1905, and the main facts stated therein are these:—

During the 20 months that separated the outbreak of war in February, 1904, and the conclusion of peace in September, 1905, the principal financial and economical features were as follow:—

I.—The Imperial Diet in its 20th session last year (1904) sanctioned an extraordinary war outlay of 576 million yen, and the 21st session in December of the same year sanctioned a further expenditure of 780 millions, making 1356 millions in all. This was to be obtained from increased taxes, from loans and from temporary accommodation. With regard to increased taxes, the amount shown in the supplementary budget for 1904-5 was 62 millions and that shown in the supplementary budget for 1905-6 was 74 millions, making 136 millions in all, while the loans floated and the temporary accommodation aggregated 982 millions and the account stood thus:—

A.	Million of yen .	Per centage.
Taken from the general revenue ...	311	23
Loans and accommodations.....	982	72
Taken from special capital funds...	63	5
Total	1,356	100

It appears from this table that over 70 per cent. of the war-funds were obtained by loans. There were 5 issues of loan-bonds in Japan, representing a total of 480 million yen, and 4 issues abroad, representing a total of 820 million (82 millions sterling), or 1,300 millions in all; but of that aggregate only 890 millions had been actually paid up by the conclusion of peace, and 92 millions had been obtained in the form of temporary accommodations, making up the 982 millions shown in Table A.

	Million yen .	Per centage.
Proceeds of Loans	900	70
" Increased taxes, &c.	210	17
" War Notes circulated	170	13
Total	1,280	100

To this last total has to be added some 400 or 500 million yen on account of the cost of bringing back the troops and on account of rewards, pensions, &c.

II.—Turning now to economical conditions the committee report that on the outbreak of the war there ensued naturally a general depression in the field of industry and commerce, but, on the other hand, some businesses were of course greatly encouraged by the exceptional outlays. Then when the dawn of peace appeared after the great battles of Mukden and the Sea of Japan, the spirits of the nation rose, only to sink again when the terms of peace came to be made known, and the depression then caused has not since been dissipated. In the realm of foreign trade there were necessarily large imports of war material, and there were also abnormal imports in anticipation of the increased tariff, whereas exports did not by any means keep pace with this growth. Thus whereas in 1904 imports represented 371¼ million yen against 319¼ millions of exports, an excess of only 52 millions on the side of imports, this year up to the end of September, the exports totalled only 224¼ millions and the imports 393 millions, the excess on the side of imports being 168¼ millions. Nevertheless, whereas in 1904 specie flowed abroad to the extent of 73¼ million yen, the proceeds of the foreign loans received in 1905 had the effect of causing a net inflow of specie amounting to 16¼ millions.

III.—Owing to the outflow of specie in the first epoch of the war, the hard-money reserve in the Bank of Japan could not be prevented from falling and at one time—May 1904—it was as low as 60 millions. Thereafter, however, by occasional loans abroad, with the proceeds of which the Treasury paid back the advances obtained by it from the Bank, the reserve was kept at about 100 millions. On the side of the people, however, trade and industry being depressed there was little demand for money, and the Bank would have found no occasion to issue any large volume of convertible notes had not the Treasury's requirements been abnormal. The net result was that the legal limit was generally exceeded largely. This meant a corresponding increase in the volume of circulating media, an increase amounting to some 70 million of yen, and a marked appreciation of commodities.

IV.—It has been shown above that some 900 millions of yen were obtained for war purposes up to the conclusion of peace. Analysing that sum, it appears that some 490 yen came from abroad and some 390 yen was obtained at home. But foreigners subscribed about 50 millions of the domestic loans, and moreover purchased about 150 million yen worth of bonds in Japan, so that it results that not more than 200 millions were actually taken out of the domestic money market for the purposes of the war. Of course the sums collected in the form of extra taxes belong to this category, but they represent only a little over 100 millions. Then again there are the temporary accommodations obtained by the Government and the Treasury Bills issued, but against these have to be set the sums taken from special sources and put into circulation. There can be no doubt that in the net result, the monies added to the circulating media considerably exceeded the monies taken from them. It is stated that fully 60 per cent. of the total war outlays passed into the hands of the people at home, and this represents an amount of at least 600 or 700 millions. There is nothing unexpected therefore in the abundance of money in the market. Thus the deposits in the Associated Banks of Tokyo and Osaka are gradually reaching a very large figure, whereas the demand for accommodation does not at all keep pace with this growth. Notably considerable are the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks. There is certainly little activity in commercial circles, but inasmuch as great sums are still paid out in connexion with the war and on other accounts, the volume of transactions at the Tokyo and Osaka Clearing Houses is very large.

V.—In conclusion, looking at the whole economical situation it may be said to have reached a half-way stage. Great sums have already been paid but great sums have still to follow during several months to come. Consequently the principal economic effects produced are still things of the future.

CHINA.

Wednesday, December 20.

In the Kokumin Shimbun some interesting particulars are given about the Kwantung Peninsula. The area leased to the Japanese as successors of the Russians is 2,784 square verst (about 205 Japanese square ri). This figure is founded on Russian measurements but an accurate survey is being made by the Japanese. There are altogether 48,509 houses inhabited by 327,567 persons, which is an average of nearly 7 persons per house, an exceptionally large figure. Among these inhabitants there are 4,754 Japanese, residing for the most part in Tairen, 322,756 Chinese, and 56 foreigners who live principally in Port Arthur. This last figure shows how completely the Russians and other Western nationals have taken their departure. During the Russian regime there were nearly 300 men in the mercantile houses at Port Arthur, but evidently such great establishments as Clarkson & Co., Chortin & Co., the Ostasiatisk Kompagni, Ginsburg & Co., Kunst and Albers, the Russo-Chinese Bank and so on have disappeared almost in toto. For administrative purposes the Japanese have divided the region into the Tairen District (156 hamlets), the Port Arthur District (406 hamlets) and the Kinchow District (989 hamlets). Tairen is the seat of the chief government office, and in Port Arthur and Kinchow there are branch offices. Apparently the Japanese have avoided making any changes in the local administrative mechanism that existed under Russian rule. There are still "headmen" of villages and "chief headmen" over every 10 villages. One school each has been established in Tairen, Port Arthur and Kinchow, with the idea of supplying an educational model and, at the same time, giving instruction in the Japanese language. In Tairen there are 199 officially owned buildings which let for a total of 6,637 yen monthly (an average of 43 yen, showing that they must be a good class of edifice), and the area of Government land rented to the people is 83,503 tsubo, on which the sum paid is 5,607 yen monthly. This last figure indicates that the average rent of land is nearly 7 sen per tsubo monthly, or 84 sen yearly, or three times the amount paid by foreigners at the open ports in Japan as rent and taxes combined. The Chinese pay 3,477 yen monthly on the ground occupied by them and on their market-place. Since the Japanese came into occupation they have earnestly encouraged afforestation, and the areas planted in Tairen, Port Arthur and Kinchow now measure 800 acres. In the field of agriculture, commerce and industry careful investigations are being made. There is a Manchurian trade guild, and since last month the civil administration has organized a committee which, with its assistants, totals 97 persons and 21 interpreters. It is sent to all parts of the region to conduct economic inquiries.

THE MILITARY FATE IN TOKYO.

At 10.30 a.m. on the 17th instant the troops which had been told off to take part in the triumphal march to Uyeno assembled in and outside Hibiya Park. Unhappily the weather proved most unpropitious. Heavy rain began to fall between 7 and 8 in the morning, and though it cleared up for a brief interval, a regularly wet sodden day ultimately set in. The effect upon the crowd was to reduce it by probably one half, nearly the entire female element being deterred by the incessant downpour. Had all the forces now in Tokyo paraded there would have been an immense army—from 40,000 to 50,000 according to rumour—but the march of such a host through the streets being out of the question, it was arranged that only the Head Quarter Staffs of the Manchurian Armies and of the First Army, with the Divisional Staffs of the Guards and the Cavalry, together with the Guards Division should form the procession. This meant about fifteen thousand of all arms with 24 guns. The men were drawn up partly outside and partly inside the Park. It had been intended that all the staff officers should be on horseback, but this intention underwent a change so far as concerned Field Marshal Marquis Oyama, General Baron Kodama and General Baron Kuroki, all of whom, with their personal staffs, rode in carriages. At 20 minutes before 11 o'clock an aide-de-camp galloped off to intimate to the Field Marshal that the parade was formed, and at exactly 11, as previously announced, the column began to move off from the left. The carriages of the Commander-in-chief and his staff took the lead, surrounded by a guard of honour, and then followed the infantry, the cavalry and the artillery, with rear-guards and van-guards duly marshalled. The regiments carried the colours that had accompanied them throughout the war, and as the battered ensigns were borne along, eloquent of the fierce struggles over which they had waved, the crowd broke into peal after peal of vociferous cheering. Exactly an hour was required by the procession to file past a given point, though no delays or interruptions of any kind were noticeable, the arrangements being faultless. Some of the men looked thin, but all were evidently in robust health, and as for the cavalry horses they showed no sign of having gone through a long campaign. The column marched by the main street direct to Uyeno, where it arrived at 1.40 p.m. In the Park the Field-Marshal and the Generals and the staff officers were received by the Governor of the city, the Mayor and a deputation of the municipality. Their Imperial Highnesses Princes Kanin and Kun were present, as were also the Foreign Representatives and many distinguished personages, making a party of some 1,800 persons. Mr. Ozaki Yukio, the Mayor, read an address of congratulation, to which the Field-Marshal replied briefly. It being impossible to provide provisions for such a number of soldiers in the Park, arrangements were made for them to receive food and drink in their barrack-rooms after returning, and to that end each man was handed a ticket, and a paper containing the city's congratulatory greetings. The streets of course were brilliantly decorated and the people gave the troops a loud acclaim as they passed. At a little past 2 o'clock a standing collation was served for the officers and guests, and at its conclusion fire-works were discharged, but few people remained in the Park a moment longer than was necessary.

THE HEAD QUARTER STAFF.

The Message delivered by the Emperor to Marquis Yamagata, General Terauchi and Admiral Yamamoto on the 20th inst., was in connexion with the abolition of the specially organized Head Quarter Staff. Subsequently the Field Marshal assembled all the members of the Staff at the War Office and delivered a brief address, in which, after thanking them for their services and congratulating them on the results achieved, he said that undoubtedly this war had furnished many useful object lessons in strategy, tactics, armament, equipment and land transport, which lessons, he was sure, had been fully learned by the members of the Staff and would be turned to due account. Among the members of the specially organized Staff the following were attached to the permanent staff, namely, General Kodama, Lt.-General Prince Kanin, and Major-Generals Murata and Yamane.

The special Staff of the Navy have also been released from duty and the appointments alluded to in our last issue have been made. In this context it may be mentioned that the Standing Squadron (the First) of which Vice-Admiral Kataoka is appointed commander, consists of 6 armoured cruisers, and that the Second Standing Squadron under Vice-Admiral Dewa is to be composed of second and third-class cruisers. Nothing is said as to the disposition of line-of-battle ships. The South-China Squadron spoken of in our last is a new creation but its composition is not yet published.

THE COURTESIES OF THE GERMANS.

It must be confessed even by those who see most danger in the super-abundant energy of that wonderful monarch the Kaiser, that His Majesty knows well how to practise perfect courtesy. His special instructions to his chamberlains that they should arrange for the supply of a quantity of tobacco and chocolate for the Japanese prisoners as they passed through Berlin was a most graceful and thoughtful act. It is stated that the chief chamberlain himself and an assistant chamberlain were directed to proceed to the station and distribute these gifts among the prisoners. The German Government also provided every possible facility for the prisoners; they received the utmost sympathy and kindness in all parts of Germany as they travelled through, and the German Red Cross Society appointed an entertainment committee to look after them. When these things were reported to the Emperor of Japan, His Majesty desired that Mr. Inouye, the Japanese Representative in Berlin, should be instructed to convey to the Kaiser his sincere thanks.

We commend this incident to the Hochi Shimbun which, writing recently about Germany in a gracious mood, made use of the sentence, onjin naru shochi ni isuru dake sore dake ta wo shite soko-kibi waruku nani-goto ka himitsu no sonshi awasaru ya wo utagawashimu. The treatment of the Japanese prisoners at all events should give unqualified satisfaction to our contemporary.

MAJOR-GENERAL SHIBUYA.

This officer commanded the commissariat corps of the First Army. He and his men landed in March, 1904, at Chinnampo, in advance of the Army, and in spite of the signally defective routes of communication in Korea, established the transport arrangements on a satisfactory basis and contrived that there should be no sense of insufficient supplies at the battle of the Yalu, or in the Army's subsequent operations, though they took place in a mountainous and extremely difficult country. Indeed the commissariat system of the Japanese constituted one of their most signal successes throughout the war, and this is especially true of the First Army's corps, for the Army moved on the extreme right of the wave of invasion, and was thus manœuvring constantly in mountainous and precipitous regions. Probably the corps experienced its greatest difficulties in the battle of Liaoyang when Kuroki's right was thrown forward across the Shaho and supplies had to be carried to it under circumstances of signal hardship. The general public are apt to pay scant attention to the non-combatant sections of an army but the commissariat corps attached to the forces under General Kuroki performed service of the very highest order. Major-General Shibuya and a part of the corps arrived at Shimbashi by the 2.56 train on the 20th.

THE LATE MISS B. J. ALLEN.

The Record of November 3rd contains notice of the death in England of Miss B. J. Allen, a missionary attached to the C.M.S., who laboured most devotedly in Nagasaki and Kokura for ten years, until invalided home. Her many friends in Japan will hear the sad tidings with deep regret, for her loss is one which must be deplored by all who came in contact with her.

We regret to record the death of Miss Beatrice Julia Allen, which took place at Litchfield on October 16. Miss Allen, who was the daughter of the late Venerable John Allen, Archdeacon of Salop from 1847 to 1886, was trained as a nurse at King's College Hospital. Subsequently she was appointed superintendent of the Ladies' Convalescent Home at Scarborough, a position which she occupied from 1875 to 1879. Her next sphere of activity was as Hon. Secretary of the Pimlico Ladies' Association for the Care of Friendless Girls, and during the thirteen years—1882-95—she was thus engaged she became well known among London workers. In 1895 she gave herself up to missionary work, proceeding to Japan under the auspices of the C.M.S. and remaining there for ten years. She suffered from diseases peculiar to the climate, and was eventually stricken with tuberculosis. Invalided home she arrived at Litchfield exactly a month before the day of her death. The General Council of the Church Missionary Society have forwarded the following Resolution: "The Committee have heard with deep regret of the death of their valued missionary, Miss B. J. Allen. They place on record their keen appreciation of the self-sacrificing devotion which has characterized her ten years of missionary service, and they thank God for the souls He has given her to her ministry. They deeply sympathize with the missionaries in the heavy loss in counsel and work which is involved in her lamented removal." The Rev. B. Baring Gould, Secretary, in conveying the Resolution to Miss Allen, says: "I cannot but feel that your sister's whole-hearted devotion to her work went far towards undermining her health." The funeral took place at St. Michael's Church, Litchfield. It was a simple but impressive ceremony, the body being carried from the home of the family, in the Market Square to the church, the mourners following on foot.

THE FAMINE IN NORTHERN JAPAN.

A correspondent asks whether we can fully confirm the report published in our issue of the 14th instant with regard to the distress in northern Japan. We fear that the account is only too true. The Japanese authorities are grappling with the terrible calamity, but it need scarcely be said that official charity can never be fully effective, and that it must always leave a large margin of unrelieved distress. We have seen some of the food on which the unhappy people are now sustaining life. It is in the form of round briquettes consisting of 75 per cent. of chopped straw and 25 per cent. of foreign rice. That human beings should have to subsist upon such fare is shocking and soon even this resource will fail. We learn that the War Office has despatched great quantities of superfluous stores which are being sold to the starving at a fraction of cost price, but certainly this is an opportunity for that splendid charity which the foreign community of Japan have never failed to show. It is to be feared, indeed, that not during the past fifty years has such widespread and vivid distress invited relief.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

We see by home papers that there has been a great celebration at Goathland on the occasion of the coming of age of Mr. Neil McEacharn, eldest son of Sir Malcolm McEacharn. The tenants, by whom Sir Malcolm and Lady McEacharn are said to be held in high esteem, assembled in large numbers and partook of a banquet provided by their landlord. A silver bowl was presented to Mr. Neil McEacharn.

In connexion with his re-appointment to the post of the President of the Imperial University, Mr. Hamao has been made Shinnin-kan. This means that he cannot be removed from office without the direct sanction of the Emperor.

The following appointments are announced:—

To be Governor of Miyagi Mr. Kamei Eizaburo, hitherto Governor of Shizuoka.
To be Governor of Shizuoka Mr. Rinoie Rinsuke, hitherto Governor of Toyama.
To be Governor of Toyama Mr. Kawakami Chikaharu, hitherto a police official.

The Suo (Pobitda) arrived safely at Sascho on the 16th under her own steam. This is essentially one of the ships indicated by the Russians as having been completely shattered, especially as to her boilers and machinery. Either the Japanese must be singularly apt repairers of ships or the Russians must be very inefficient destroyers of them.

It would seem that General Ogawa has not fully recovered from the wound received by him at Shanshaupau during the battle of Liaoyang. The General was examining a map in the offices of the Divisional Staff when a shell burst in his vicinity and a fragment struck his head. He is an officer celebrated for skill in flank attacks, and it was by such a manoeuvre on the part of his troops that the great fight at Nanshan was won. Strong hopes were entertained that the distinguished General would recover fully from his wound, but the Official Gazette now announces his removal to the Retired List, so it is to be feared that he will not again be fit for service.

On the 30th of November the Prize Court of Appeal rejected the appeals in the cases of the following vessels and declared them confiscated together with their cargoes:—

German steamer Industrie (198 tons).
British steamer Burway (1,142 tons).
Originally adjudicated by the Sasebo Prize Court.
Norwegian steamer Henry Balkow (1,006 tons).
Originally adjudicated by the Yokosuka Prize Court.
The Henry Balkow was the fifty-first of the captured steamers. Only 3 or 4 now remain unadjudicated.

The death is announced of Mr. Furukawa Junkichi, second son of the late Count Mutsu. He was adopted into the Furukawa family, and after the demise of the elder Mr. Furukawa he became, in effect, sole manager of the latter's extensive property, including the Ashiwo Copper Mine. The cause of death was consumption, the same disease that carried off his father, the illustrious Count Mutsu.

Another distinguished man, Vice-Admiral Tsunoda, has been called away. The Vice-Admiral was in command at Takeshiki throughout the war, and he would doubtless have been one of those to receive signal recognition for good service.

We take the following from an English journal:—

The Japanese Government have elaborated an extensive scheme for the improvement of the stock of horses in Japan, and are anxious to import the best stallions from Europe. Some horses have already been bought in England and Ireland for the Japanese Government have been investigating the sources of Europe's horse supply, and have traced it to this country. With characteristic forethought and care for the future, Japan is quick to repair the one weak spot in her armour, revealed by the recent war—the comparative ineptitude of her cavalry, owing to their defective mounting. The native Japanese horse is a miserable animal, which centuries of inbreeding, and no infusion of fresh blood, has reduced to the verge of uselessness. In coming to England for new blood Japan is only following the example of her late rival. Seven years ago the Russian Government purchased, for something like £20,000, the Derby winner, "Galtee More," from the well-known Irish breeder, Mr. John Gubbins, and, three years ago, they bought the same gentleman's other Derby winner "Ard Patrick," for a like sum. The Russians are invariably extensive buyers at our biggest horse sales. It is highly probable that the Japanese buyers will draw extensively on the resources of the Irish breeders. The Irish horses of the present generation are mainly the descendants of the old Irish breed, crossed with the best strains of running blood from the English Turf. They retain the hardiness and the stamina of their ancestors—often mountain ponies—and there is little doubt but that they would do much towards the improvement of the Japanese stock, as the Government of that country desires. Breeders of good horse-flesh in this country may, therefore, anticipate numerous orders from Japan, and it is to be hoped that good business may be the result.

It is hard on the Japanese pony and very unjust to call him "a miserable animal" and to place him "on the verge of uselessness." This is a cry started by foreign newspaper correspondents who judged entirely by appearances. Before echoing it we should like to know what the Russian horse accomplished in Manchuria by comparison.

One of the steamers engaged in the second blocking expedition has been re-floated and will soon resume her duties as a commercial carrier. She is the Yahiko Maru (2,692 tons), and she was sent to the bottom near the mouth of the harbour, but apparently in such a position that her presence did not seriously inconvenience the Russians and she consequently escaped their dynamite.

The six horses sent by the Kaiser to the Mikado arrived in Tokyo on the 16th and were taken to the German Legation. Count Arco Valley, with his usual hospitality, chose the occasion to give a luncheon to the five German officials who accompanied the horses, and to the Japanese officials of the Imperial Household Department who came to take delivery of the animals. The stallions are spoken of in terms of the highest admiration. They are said to be magnificent specimens of horse-flesh.

It has been definitely fixed that the Tsukuba is to be launched on the 26th. The Prince Imperial, attended by Admiral Togo, will be present.

The United States commercial agent in Vladivostok is reported as having sent to a certain quarter a despatch to the effect that order has been restored there and that commerce shows a tendency to prosper. But owing to a prevailing lack of coolie labour ships entering the port experience great inconvenience. This is true not of Japanese vessels alone but of those of all nationalities. There is not the slightest evidence of Russian officials treating the Japanese improperly. It may be taken for granted that this account, in view of its source, is trustworthy, little as it agrees with reports emanating from other quarters. A curious thing, too, is that we hear nothing of the punishment meted out to the sometime rioters. They assassinated at least five hundred people and committed several acts of incendiarism as well as other crimes, yet, so far as the public knows, they have not been visited with anything like adequate penalties. That method of restoring order is not very re-assuring.

By desire of the Italian Government it has been decided to cancel the diplomatic notes dated December 1st, 1894, and attached to the Treaty concluded on the same date. These notes provide that whereas Italian commerce with Japan is regulated in accordance with the most-favoured-nation principle only, there being no conventional tariff, it shall be competent for either of the high contracting parties to subsequently propose the enactment of such a tariff, by way of supplement to most-favoured-nation treatment, in the case of articles of special interest. Apparently experience has convinced Italy that most-favoured-nation treatment meets all the needs of the situation, and she has divested herself of competence to ask for a conventional tariff.

The business men of Tokyo gave a banquet to Marquis Ito in the Imperial Hotel on the evening of the 18th. A number of Ministers of State, including the Premier, attended, as did many other distinguished publicists. Baron Shibusawa proposed the health of Marquis Ito, and the latter replied at considerable length. He laid much stress on the obligations devolving on Japan with regard to Korea. It would not do merely to rejoice that Korea had passed partially under this country's protection. The Japanese nation must recognise that their duty was to make Korea strong, prosperous and happy, and not to regard her simply as a field to be exploited for Japanese benefit. Japan had been obliged to fight twice on account of Korea, and the true way to avert fresh complications was to win Korea's coöperation by kind and considerate treatment and to prove to her practically that her real interests lay in following the path of progress.

The Army Department does not publish any statistics of returning soldiers, which is natural seeing that the movement is continuous. But an accurate record is kept at the medical inspection stations where the officers and men undergo disinfection en route for their respective destinations. From these records it appears (Kokumin Shinbun) that up to the 12th of this month the total number who have returned is 212,106 of all ranks. They are divided according to medical-inspection stations as follows:—

Ninoshima	120,292
Dairi	52,430
Wada-no-misaki	39,384

Total 212,106

This may be said to represent 2 months work, and if the same rate is preserved, as seems more than likely, the total brought home by 12th April next will be fully 636,000. We do not know exactly what was the aggregate strength of the various Japanese armies in the field when peace was concluded, but it can scarcely have exceeded three-quarters of a million.

The Tokyo Court of First Instance has published its finding in the case of the men arrested in connexion with the riots on the 5th and 6th of September. Messrs. Kono Hironaka, Otake Kanichi, Ogawa Heikichi and Sakurai Kumataro are all declared to have been ringleaders, and Mr. Tsuda Shimpu is found to have been an inciter. These five are sent for trial, on a charge of "assembling rioters" (kyōto shushu), by the Major Crimes Section of the Tokyo Local Court, their permission to remain out on bail being withdrawn. Nine others, from Mr. Yoshizawa Fujio downwards, are to be tried by the Minor Crimes Section as "promoters." Eleven others, including Messrs. Yamada Kinusuke and Hosono Jiro, are released, the evidence against them being insufficient.

The Official Gazette announces the redemption of a part of the 6 per-cent. domestic debt, doubtless with the proceeds of the last foreign loan. The programme is that 40 millions' worth of bonds (sold originally at 90) will be drawn by lot on the 5th of February next and redeemed between the 21st and the 31st of March. Another 40 millions will be drawn at the same time—5th of February—and redeemed between the 16th and the 25th of April. The remainder of this particular six per cent loan will be redeemed between the 16th and the 25th of May.

Rumour says that the following appointments will soon be gazetted:—

Admiral Togo to be Chief of the Naval Staff.
Admirals Ito and Inouye to be Counsellors of the Naval Staff.
Rear-Admiral Kato to be Director of the Bureau of Naval Affairs.
Vice-Admiral Kusunoki to Command at Yokosuka.
Vice-Admiral Uryu to Command at Takashiki.
Vice-Admiral Hashimoto to Command at the Pescadores.
Vice-Admiral Kataoka to Command the First Squadron.
Vice-Admiral Dewa to Command the Second Squadron.
Rear-Admiral Taketomi to Command the South China Squadron.

On the 19th inst., at 10.30 a.m. the Emperor summoned to the Palace Field Marshal Marquis Yamagata, Admiral Baron Yamamoto, General Ierauchi and Admiral Viscount Ito. His Majesty warmly thanked the four officers for the assistance they had rendered in directing the affairs of the Army and Navy during the war, so that all the country's enterprises succeeded and the object of the campaign was realized.

Fire broke out on the night of Dec. 13th in the village of Kusagi, Shiga Prefecture, destroying thirty-four buildings including five warehouses.

SUNDAY-OBSERVANCE IN ENGLAND.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

No one needs to be told that England is intensely and even bigotedly conservative. But still in the opinion of those who have eyes to see she is moving ahead, even though at a pace that is slower than that maintained by rival nations. For many years past the notions of the units that form the bulk of the English nation as to the observance of Sunday have been seriously at variance with the ideas of ministers of religion on the same topic. The majority of English people see no harm in Sunday tennis, golf and boating. Many of them habitually go to church on Sunday morning and devote the rest of the day to recreation as is done in France, Germany and elsewhere by the principal sections of the community. But hitherto Church of England authorities have refused to sanction the exercise of any such liberty in the observance of Sunday. They have opposed the opening of places of amusement on Sunday, Sunday Concerts and the like. One would hardly have expected that Oxford of all places should originate a radical change in the matter of sabbath-observance. But this is what has happened. At a recent Diocesan Conference, reported in the London papers on Sept. 28th, the members arrived at the following conclusions: Sabbath observance depends on principles of worship and rest. Rest means refreshment, bodily and mental, and includes innocent recreation. Therefore, if a man goes to church in the morning, he is at liberty to spend the remainder of his day as his conscience allows him to do, without let or hindrance from the clergy. And if, further, we want to know what innocent recreation means, the only condition which the conference sought to impose was that there should be no employment of other people's labour—that on the river a man should row himself and on the golf links should carry his own clubs. The Daily Telegraph, in a leading article published on Sept. 29th, rightly commends the boldness and common-sense of the members of the Oxford Diocesan Conference and predicts that means of this kind will go far to restore the influence of the clergy on the nation—influence that owing to the exclusiveness of the clergy as a body has in recent years been so reduced as to be hardly perceptible. "How comes it," asks the Daily Telegraph, "that the clergy as a whole have so little influence on the community? Is there any other explanation than that ministers of religion tend to become a close corporation, a body separate and apart, a special caste of hierophants, who have a different life, a different manner of thought, from the large majority of their fellow-citizens. For surely the only other explanation is untenable. We cannot draw an indictment against a nation and say that it has deliberately cast away from itself all the things which make for its peace. No one who keeps his eyes open and does not allow himself to be deceived by superficial appearances can possibly affirm that the British people as a whole are irreligious or even sceptical. . . . The value of this Oxford decision lies in its effects on that contrast between the Church and the World to which we have already alluded."

A correspondent signing himself "Christian" writes thus on the Puritan Sunday:—"It is the sheer, blind intolerance of the old-fashioned, puritanical observance of the Lord's Day, which to the non-Puritan has always seemed so repellent. The Puritans—good people, who would endure anything rather than submit their consciences to the bidding of external authority—have stubbornly insisted on their right to trample on the liberties of others. Happily, there has been a violent reaction in recent years against this religious despotism—which usually wears the unlovely garb of sanctimoniousness and hypocrisy and is utterly deficient in the quality of charity. But the Sunday in many parts of Wales and the Highlands is, even yet, a positive nightmare to the unfortunate stranger, who finds during that day that all the civilities and urbanities of life are forgotten. . . . The English Sunday, too, has harsh features, which are only too patent to those who have eyes to see. It is an unreal day, a day of pretence, a day of shams. The Puritan Sunday makes no allowance for the natural high spirits of humanity when resting from work; by making joyousness on that day a sin it has bred hypocrisy. It has not rendered those within the orbit of its influence whit more virtuous. . . . He is a bold man who would say that London spends its Sundays more profitably than Paris, Berlin or Vienna. The ideal Sunday, to my mind, is one on which each man should worship after his own way, and rest after his own way and recreate himself, soul and body, after his own way, without let or hindrance to any man or from any man. Is not that the meaning of the words, Whose service is perfect freedom?"

When we compare the liberality of the Roman Catholic church in the matter of Sunday amusements with the rules observed and enjoined by the Protestant clergy we are astounded at the useless strictness enforced by Protestants. Many of the Roman Catholic priests not only allow their converts to play cards and other games on Sunday, but they habitually play themselves. The present writer has himself repeatedly witnessed this exercise of Christian liberty on board ship and elsewhere. In the face of this it is somewhat surprising that the Protestant missionaries of Japan should always deem it obligatory on them to close tennis courts which they control on Sundays at Karui-zawa, Hakodate and elsewhere, to the annoyance of certain members of such clubs who wish to play on those days. It is a form of the Puritan Christian (?) despotism denounced by the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, from whom we have quoted. But the British Sunday, happily, is no longer what it was. The Sunday trains and excursion boats are crowded. Golf and tennis and other games are sanctioned by the more liberal-minded clergy. The "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon Society" and several kindred Societies are doing excellent work, and the names of not a few clergymen are to be found in the lists of members. But London is not yet blessed with a Sunday delivery of letters and newspapers; though there is a delivery throughout the various counties, and places like the Zoological Gardens are on Sundays closed to ordinary visitors, admission only being allowed to the holders of special tickets. In all these matters the stolid conservatism of England astounds foreign visitors and British colonials alike. But every proposed relaxation of the rules observed is met with a storm of opposition. The English public seems to prefer to keep the rules as they are and quietly break them habitually. The "look-see" must be kept up at all costs.

ORGAN RECITAL.

The organ recital at Union Church on Tuesday afternoon drew rather a sparse congregation, owing doubtless to several public engagements taking place about the same hour. The Cantata, "The Nativity of Christ," was repeated with signal success, going if anything better than on the first occasion. Owing to indisposition Miss Lloyd Thomas was unable to take the soprano solos, and Miss Mendelson very kindly took her place, discharging an arduous and unexpected task very charmingly. The other soloists, Mr. Cooper and Mr. Somerton, were both in fine voice and rendered their parts very sympathetically. With the exception of the hymn, "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" the rest of the programme was as on the occasion of the last recital, Miss Mendelson taking the solo in the anthem "As pants the Hart," and Mr. W. Karl Vincent playing five selections on the organ. The offertory was on behalf of the Sendai Famine Fund and realised the sum of yen 172.

THE CHRIST CHILD.

Firelight and love, and children's voices sing,
Singing thro' the gladness of the winter day;
Lovelight and fire, and the merry joy-bells ringing,
Ringing strife and sorrow and anger away.
Star-shine and snow, and angel voices falling,
Falling thro' the stillness of the winter night;
Snow-shine and stars, and the little Christ-child calling.
Calling men to beauty and peace and light.

JOURNALISTIC INGENUOUSNESS.

THE story originally published with regard to what were called "the methods adopted by the Japanese Authorities in Seoul to secure the formal consent of the Korean Foreign Office to the Agreement," was that "when the Foreign Minister announced that on account of the determination to resist the Japanese demands to the last he had not even brought his seal with him, the assistant of the Japanese Foreign Adviser, NUMANO by name, fetched the seal from the Foreign Office and the box in which the seal was kept was broken open." Further, it was stated, by way of comment on the story, that "when a seal is obtained by such means and then affixed by some one other than the Foreign Minister, it is certain that the validity of the Agreement will always be open to dispute, and as coercive measures will most certainly have to be adopted before the EMPEROR will consent to ratify the Treaty, there is no room for doubting that the whole instrument is an absolutely worthless one."

This is a perfectly clear story. It represents the Korean Minister as refusing to produce his seal because he and his colleagues had determined that the Agreement should not be concluded; it represents the Japanese as fetching the seal in spite of the Minister's protests; it represents them as breaking the box containing the seal, the evident intention being to suggest that the Minister declined to open the box; and it finally represents them as affixing the seal to the Agreement in defiance of the Minister's refusal to do so. This story was published on the sole authority of an obscure English journal in Seoul which enjoys only one distinction, that of inveterate hostility to every act of the Japanese in Korea.

Then we have another story. It comes from the Japanese Legation in Seoul, is officially published and ought therefore to command entire credence. This second story shows that the charge against the Japanese of having concluded the Agreement forcibly, in spite of the Korean Foreign Minister, and a virtual act of forgery, is absolutely false. It shows that the Minister signed the Agreement in accordance with his SOVEREIGN's instructions and in accordance with his own conviction; that he caused five telephonic messages to be addressed to the keeper of the seal summoning him to bring it; that the keeper, happening to be absent, as he might well have been, considering the lateness of the hour, the seal was not obtained until after a considerable delay; that the Minister, though he had already signed the Agreement, waited to affix his seal, a formality essential in the East, and that the whole business was perfectly regular.

It is obvious that the two stories differ as much as light differs from darkness. One sets forth that the Japanese concluded the agreement by force and fraud, that the Koreans were not consenting parties and that the document is in consequence absolutely worthless. The other sets forth that neither force nor fraud was employed in any shape; that the Koreans were consenting though reluctant parties, and that the document has all the validity of any duly signed and regularly concluded compact.

The Japan Herald, commenting on these two stories, avers that they "differ very slightly." So determined is that journal to throw discredit on Japanese proceedings in Korea that it actually asks its readers to regard the second story as not differing materially from the first. Yet it would be difficult to conceive any two accounts more radically divergent.

We write this not in the interests of controversy but in those of justice and fair play, for which we have no doubt that our contemporary entertains due respect. But there is a group of newspapers—one in Seoul, one in Kobe and two in Yokohama—which have constituted themselves an orchestra perpetually hostile to Japan in her Korean relations. If any one of this group pens a severe criticism or discovers what it believes to be a damaging fact, the others either reproduce or echo the note of attack, and in this way a strong attempt is made to influence public opinion. In the particular case under review the most obscure and not the least biased of this newspaper quintette preferred against Marquis Ito and the other diplomatic officials of Japan in Korea an accusation of the grossest kind; an accusation that they had obtained an important treaty from Korea by a combination of fraud and force. The Japanese Legation in Seoul published a detailed account of the whole proceedings, showing, as might well have been expected, that the above accusation was totally groundless. One imagines that the Japan Herald would have gladly welcomed the Japanese official version and would not have hesitated for a moment in choosing between it and the version of a petty sheet published in Seoul which has uniformly shown itself blindly and absorbingly inimical to Japan. But the Japan Herald sets itself to prove that the Seoul journal's account may be true, and in order to show that the Korean Ministers yielded to force majeure, makes the extraordinary statement that "the Ministers who were forced have retaliated by committing suicide." That assertion strikingly illustrates the carelessness of our contemporary. The men who committed suicide—one of them when in a state of intoxication—were MIN YONG-HWA and CHO PRONG-SE. Neither of them held a portfolio. To speak of them as "the Ministers who were forced" is worse than an inaccuracy; it is a palpable falsehood. The Minister who signed the Convention is now Premier, a fact which conclusively proves that his signature and seal were appended voluntarily, though he is represented as having been the principal victim of the force and fraud exercised by the Japanese. Yet the Japan Herald has the assurance to accuse the Japanese Legation of "trifling with the truth." This by no means the only instance of flagrant inaccuracy on the part of our contemporary, but we shall not refer to the others, one such instance being quite enough to indicate the spirit of that journal's comments. The matter is not unimportant. We know well by long experience how tenacious lies are of existence, and how much tolerance is shown toward them by the journals originally responsible for their circulation. In this case the reputation of Japan is at stake, and though it may be a very small matter whether any particular local newspaper is truthful or untruthful, fair or unfair, it is not a small matter that stories fatal to the accuracy of history should be left uncontradicted.

THE PEKING NEGOTIATIONS.

IT is plain that a sentiment of disappointment begins to permeate the Japanese nation with regard to the negotiations now proceeding in Peking. There has not been, it is true, any trustworthy statement of results achieved or even of demands preferred. Secrecy seems to have been most successfully preserved. Rumour, however, more circumstantial than rumours generally are, affirms that the Russians know exactly what is going on. They are supposed to be kept informed by a Bishop of the Greek Church who has the unrestricted entree of the Palace and is on terms of the most confidential nature with the famous, or notorious, chief eunuch. Stories of that kind people the atmosphere of Peking and have peopled it from time immemorial. They generally attribute extraordinarily acute perspicacity to the Russians, whereas history does not contain many traces of such an endowment. But the question is not who knows or who is ignorant. The question is, has any real progress been made by the negotiations and if so what progress? Somehow or other the public fleure can never be permanently paralysed, and what it indicates in this case is, generally, that the Chinese are determined not to concede to Japan anything more than Russia legally possessed in Manchuria, and specially that they will grant no new railway concessions. The Chinese on the present occasion have been required to make a momentous choice. They have been required to choose whether they would trust Japan and repose frank confidence in the Anglo-Japanese alliance, or whether they would adhere to their perennial policy of trusting no one and to the isolation which has brought upon them such frequent and serious troubles. Perhaps it is not too much to say that the fate of the Chinese empire depends upon this choice. It is impossible for any unprejudiced reader of history to withhold his sympathy from China. She has been badly, almost uniformly badly, treated by foreign Powers in the past, and if she retained any remnant of trustfulness it would be strange. That is the sentimental view of the matter. But there is also a practical view. Two States, one an Occidental, the other an Oriental, have now separated themselves from the group of Powers who, under various pretexts, some brutal, some specious, have hitherto held China in a vice. Those two States have proclaimed themselves the guardians of her territorial integrity, and one of them has fought in her behalf the most terrible war in modern annals. If ever an opportunity offered for a country to purchase ease and safety at a low price, such an opportunity now offers to China. Yet it would seem that she can not dissociate herself from her suffering past, and that she is no more prepared to believe in the integrity of her Oriental neighbour's purpose than she is prepared to believe in the forbearance of the Occidental State from whose aggressions she has barely been rescued. Were she disposed to place any credit in Japan—we say nothing of gratitude, preferring to dismiss all emotional elements—she would gladly make in Manchuria such concessions as might correct the incompleteness of Japan's victory. Russia has not been driven completely out of the Three Eastern Provinces. She retains a foothold in the two northern of them, and unless she has changed the spots on her leopard's skin, she will gather strength there for a fresh spring southward. The obvious way to avert this peril is to strengthen the Japanese counterpoise, and that can be done only by according to Japan a position strategically so advantageous as to paralyse any aggressive purpose on Russia's part. The Japanese should be allowed to link up their Korean and Manchurian systems of railways so as to bring their main base within minimum range of the prospective field; they should be allowed to carry the road from Changchun to Kirin so as to command the northern highways; and they should be allowed to join Mukden with Hsinmintun so as to open an important route of supplies as well as an avenue for the co-operation of China herself. But the Chinese seem just as anxious to prevent all increase of Japan's potentialities as to avoid any risk of Russian resentment. They refuse every railway concession on the most trivial grounds. Russia never received any title to build a line from Changchun to Kirin, therefore Japan must not receive it—an argument which places Russia and Japan in precisely the same category. Mukden is the site of the Tsing's ancestral tombs, therefore Mukden must not be approached by a foreign-owned line from Hsinmintun—an argument which ignores the fact that but for Japan's armed intervention Mukden would now be trampled under the hoofs of Cossack cavalry. A neutral zone has existed from ancient times between Korea and Manchuria, therefore there must be no railway there—an argument which disregards the existence of a military line already built. With such paltry pretexts the Chinese statesmen are understood to be meeting Japan's proposals. In short, they have chosen to keep their doors closed and stand a siege by all nations instead of admitting some to join the garrison. No wonder that the Japanese are disappointed. For this means that their immense sacrifices of life and treasure have not attained the only end that could have entirely justified them, a lasting peace for East Asia. It means that China declines to have any foreign friends; that she brackets all outside States together, and that she still entertains the vain hope of being able to guard her gates single-handed. Should this indeed prove to be her effective mood, her blindness will be quite extraordinary, for only complete loss of political vision could make her unconscious of the object lessons that have been staring her in the face for the past ten years. There will be satisfaction in two camps at all events: the camp of the prophets of the Yellow Peril and the camp of the advocates of partition. For there can be no Yellow Peril so long as the East is divided against itself, and there can be no safety for China so long as she chooses to remain an Ishmael among nations.

GERMANY AGAIN UNDER THE LENS.

IF it be not in any sense Germany's fault it certainly is her very signal misfortune that she should so often be an object of suspicion to other nations. A fresh instance has now occurred in connexion with her initiative in the matter of the withdrawal of the foreign garrison from Peking and the restriction of her own zone of military occupation in Shantung. Several Japanese journals have alluded to the matter, some vaguely, others very frankly. They ask, in effect, how this sudden access of benevolence and self-effacement on Germany's part is to be accounted for. Is this, they inquire, the same Germany who, eight years ago, seized and appropriated a slice of Chinese territory under circumstances so insufficient and by methods so unscrupulous that the incident must always remain a historical wonder. Do a nation's policy and its principles of international action undergo such fundamental metamorphosis in less than a decade, and which is the true Germany, the wolf of 1897 or the lamb of 1905? From the bewilderment suggested by these queries the critics pass to an analysis of motives, and arrive at the conclusion that Germany is now playing a game with Russia for partner and Japan for adversary. She is, on the one hand, seeking to demonstrate that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is an altogether superfluous arrangement and that, consequently, China need not attach any value to it; and, on the other, she is endeavouring to create an atmosphere of inter-state altruism in which every seemingly selfish proposal submitted to China must assume shocking proportions. At the same time Russia is acting an apparently independent but really coordinate part in the drama by avowing that she wants for herself nothing save what she already possesses, but that if privileges be granted to others, she will be compelled to claim equality of treatment. The effect of this puritanical policy is at once to re-assure and to warn China; she thinks that if these two colossal Powers are going to be so very good and so very nice, she must spare no pains to preserve their righteous mood, and to that end must treat Japan's advances and proposals with cold disfavour. Thus once again Germany falls under suspicion of assuming an inimical attitude towards Japan. She fell under this suspicion when she was supposed to have assured the TSAR that he might safely leave the Baltic provinces and littoral unguarded and might remove the ships and garrisons thence to the belligerent area in East Asia. She fell under it when her steamers showed such zealous efficiency in coaling and provisioning ROJESTVENSKY'S fleet. She fell under it when Kiaochow appeared to be the objective of the Port Arthur Squadron's flight on the 10th of August, 1904; she fell under it when the TSAR's vertebrae stiffened suddenly after his meeting with the KAISER on board the Hohenzollern; and she falls under it now on account of the very subtle significance attached to her ungarrisoning proposals.

In the vast majority of cases folks that delve deeply for motives leave the truth behind them on the surface. Not one of the suspicions of which Germany was the object from the outbreak of the war up to the Portsmouth peace, can be said to have outlived the space of days assigned by the Oriental proverb to idle rumour. They are all dead and buried, and if their phantoms are still occasionally re-invoked by ill-humoured critics, the spectres that respond are very tenuous and unsubstantial. So, too, this latest instance is probably destined to be short-lived. Certainly the Germany now acting the dove on the Peking stage is very unlike the Germany that acted the vulture on the Shantung stage in 1897. But the circumstances also were very different. In 1897 the partition of China seemed to be one of the events of the near future. Her total impotence to withstand aggression had just been demonstrated by the Japanese, and there were no apparent rivets to hold together the tottering fabric of empire. It was then a very pressing need for Germany to obtain a foot-hold in view of the coming scramble. France already had a foot-hold; so had England, a very large one; so had Russia, a large and palpably growing one. Of all the great European Powers Germany alone lacked a fulcrum for her lever of disintegration. So she seized Kiaochow, with Shantung for hinterland. But times have changed. There is now no prospect of the partition of China unless China deliberately commits suicide. A coalition of enormous strength has been formed to avert anything of the kind; a coalition of England and Japan with America and France in the second line of champions. Germany joins the group. That is all. And just as she seized Kiaochow in 1897 to furnish herself with an aggressive leverage, so she now proposes the evacuation of Pehchili to give herself a footing in the new political arena. It is all very simple and very natural. We are not so silly as to claim for Germany any fine altruism. If we did not see, every one else sees, that she would prefer a Russian Manchuria to a Japanese, because as between these two nations she has to apprehend much keener business competition in the East from the Japanese than from the Russians. Her preference, however, must remain purely academic in the face of existing circumstances, and so, of deliberate choice, she has frankly embraced the good cause, the conservation of China and of the open door with equal opportunities for all. It is a little hard that when she really espouses the right side with honest intentions, she should become the victim of far-fetched suspicions.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

A good many religious organs have discussed the expulsion of Dr. Tomizu from the Imperial University. Most of them condemn the action of the Education Department as out of harmony with the spirit of the times and as calculated to suppress free inquiry among University professors. The Kōjō Shugi (向上主義), a comparatively new magazine, which states its chief objects to be: (1) the improvement of national character, (2) the preaching of a gospel that is suited to modern society, and (3) the investigation of subjects connected with home life, discusses the legal aspects of the Tomizu case. The writer of the article is Dr. K. Ume. He thinks that the action of the Mombushō was undoubtedly the result of pressure brought to bear by the Cabinet. It was a piece of arbitrariness that ought not to be tolerated. This seems to be the view taken by the general public.*

There is no man in modern Japan whose writings are characterized by a more healthy and elevating tone than those of the talented Director of the High Industrial School, Mr. Tejima Seichi. He contributes to a recent number of the Kōjō Shugi an article on "The Character of Artizans and Poor Students" in which he calls on the public to take steps to assist the artizans to rise to a higher level of social, family and individual life than that they now occupy. Mr. Tejima is one of those thoroughly modern Japanese who believe that labour is sacred and he argues that in many respects the men who provide the nation with means of locomotion, with the necessities of everyday life, and with so many comforts which now could hardly be dispensed with deserve to be honoured even more than Government officers. The responsibilities of artizans are very great, says Mr. Tejima. Neglect of small precautions in constructing engines, machines, &c., may result in the loss of many lives. Hence every effort should be made to create among them a feeling of dignity and self-respect. They need instructing; they need books. I have some knowledge of what is being done for the artizans of other countries, and I am trying to make a beginning in the same line here.

Mr. Sawayanagi Masatarō, Head of the Bureau of General School Affairs, is a well-known Buddhist. But it would seem that he takes a very gloomy view of the prospects of modern Buddhism. In an article which he contributes to the Shūkyōkai (Religious World) he urges Buddhists to rouse themselves. Here is the substance of his remarks:—No State can dispense with religion. Society cannot get on without religious men and women. In our country Buddhists are so far ahead of all sects that when we speak of religious men we mean Buddhist priests, for compared with them Shinto priests and Christian ministers are nowhere.* Yet when we come to ask whether the Buddhist priests of Japan to-day are a necessity to the State, there are perhaps very few people who would venture to answer in the affirmative, and we hardly think the Buddhist priests themselves would be bold enough to affirm that they are indispensable to modern society. Though our Buddhist priests bear the name of religious teachers, in reality they are nothing of the sort. This is not my opinion only, it is an indisputable fact. (Yo wa ihan nagara, konnichi no Bukkyōka wo motte yūmei mujitsu no shūkyōka to dengen suru mono de aru. Ina, yo ga dengen suru mono ni arazu, jijitsu ga dengen suru mono de aru.) There are hardly any real believers in religion in this country. I regret to have to say this, but it is the truth. Yet as a religion Buddhism yields place to no creed. Her doctrines are infinitely superior to those taught by Christianity. Her antecedents are all of the most brilliant character. Beginning with the great founder of the religion, and passing on to the lives of hundreds of holy, devoted men, her annals reveal a lofty standard of attainment such as has never been surpassed in the world's history. That a religion which has so much to recommend it, that has such a glorious past to look back on, that has such treasures of sacred learning to draw from, should have dwindled down to the ignominious state in which we now find it, should have come to be nothing but the mechanical performer of meaningless and lifeless ceremonies, is too pitiful for words. In this enlightened era as far as Japan is concerned, religion alone has stood still, or rather should I say has retrograded. In everything else we have as a nation dispelled our many illusions, laughed away our superstitions and set ourselves to find out what is valuable and what is true. But our religion!—the very thought of it causes us shame and sorrow. No one who knows what Buddhism is to-day can do other than grieve over its forlorn state. Its revival seems next to impossible. And yet there never was a time when we needed religion more than we do to-day. Religion is needed to furnish us with higher ideals than are to be found in the business and in the political worlds. If Buddhism does not furnish these ideals, then Christianity may do so. I would rather see Christianity doing what it can towards supplying higher standards of life than see the nation left without any religion at all. But surely Buddhism is not going to allow itself to be replaced by Christianity in this country.

The Kōye (Roman Catholic) discusses the various interpretations given to the term "personal" when applied to God. Not very long ago the Rikugō Zasshi, which is now a Unitarian and Broad Church organ, in an article entitled Saigo no Shūkyō (The Final Stage of Religion) said that attributing personality to God in the way that Christians do was nothing but lowering the Deity to the level of man (Kami ni jinkaku ari to sureba, sude ni sore wa Kami de nai). The Kōye objects to the Japanese translation of personal 人格, jinkaku, which it says originated with Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō and his school of thinkers,† because its meaning is far more limited than is the original term. When personality is attributed to God it signifies that He is a Being separate from matter, having intelligence, will and character, but it does not imply that this Being is limited or finite. This existence is a spiritual existence and therefore quite different from that of man. The attribute of personality He has in common with man only when personality is explained in a sense that does not militate against His other attributes. Between the finite and the infinite there is a wide gulf fixed and the attributing of personality to God does not span this gulf by any means. But, continues the Kōye, somebody will say, leaving out of consideration the meaning of the term personal, is it not true that Christianity is tinged with the anthropomorphism to which philosophers object? God is represented in the Bible as making the world as a carpenter makes a house, as revealing His thoughts to man in the same way as one man reveals his thoughts to another. Like man He is made angry by evil doings. His anger abates when the offenders are penitent. He listens to men's prayers and extends His pity to them. Is not the central Gospel conception of God that of a Heavenly Father? Does not all this show that the Christian God is a deified man? The answer to this is, says the Kōye, that for teaching purposes it is necessary to explain the nature of God in terms that can be comprehended by ordinary minds. Were His infinity and transcendent attributes exclusively dwelt on, the majority of people would fail to form any conception of Him at all. Man's intelligence, love, compassion, justice and power are but poor representations of the same attributes as possessed by God, but they are better than no representations at all. The Japanese term now in use for "personal," jinkaku, should be discontinued as it is misleading, says the Kōye. If no suitable rendering can be given, then the English word "personal" had better be employed.

We are not surprised to find the Kōye reverting to the subject of Japanese opinion on the possibility of a future life in a recent number of the magazine. It says that the pamphlet entitled Raise no Umu, reviewed at some length in our last Summary, suffices to prove, were proof needed, that the Japanese people only believe in the present world and regard talks about a future life as silly dreams (Chijin no yume), as not worth a moment's consideration. Is this a gift of civilisation on which the nation can congratulate itself? We trow not, replies the Kōye. Roman Catholicism is essentially a religion of the future world. Its great rewards are there. On this account it is that our teaching excites much opposition in the minds of men. People persistently say that if our ultimate objects are only to be attained in the next world, our regard for this life can only be slight. Hence it follows that to the progress of the world will have little interest. But here they are wrong. They have measured us Christians by what they know of Buddhist pessimists. But they ignore the fact that the enormous amount of benevolent work we carry on is a proof that we are intensely interested in the temporal welfare of our fellow-men. Now, instead of belief in a future life causing indifference to the things of this life, we maintain that it immensely adds to their interest and supplies motives for action which the men who do not share this belief lack. The notion that this life is a preparation for the next gives an importance to human actions that they would not otherwise possess. Then, the effects of belief in a future life are nowhere more strikingly manifested than in the moral world. There is no such basis for morality as religion supplies. Those who know little of the kind of lives we live and the work we do may think that belief in a future life is a drawback to us, but we know the contrary to be the case. Without this belief the results of the Church's work would not be what they are.

"The Teachers of the Present Day" is the title of an article published in a recent number of the Jūdai Shichō, in which the writer reminds us that not so very many decades ago the Buddhist temples were the chief seats of learning and the priests in the world of thought led the whole nation. Now the tables are turned and the Buddhist priest finds himself hustled along on the road of progress by active pedestrians over whom he has not the slightest control. Japan has no longer any respect for its old teachers. What kind of men have succeeded them? To whom does the nation look for guidance at the present time. To Christian teachers? No. There is little demand for them. To literary men? There are none whose influence is great.

* Since the above was penned the resignation of the Minister of Education has been officially reported. This would look as though the Minister's policy was not backed by the Cabinet, as Count Katsura at once accepted the resignation as the natural result of the Minister's action. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

* Mr. Sawayanagi is referring to numbers only here, as will be seen later on. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

† In this we think the Kōye to be mistaken, older writers than Dr. Inoue used the term. In Dr. Inoue's dictionary 人格 jinkaku is given as the equivalent of personality. (WRITER OF SUMMARY.)

The men who lead their fellow-men in modern Japan are men with very decided opinions, men who have confidence in themselves, men with principles for which they are prepared to fight and labour. But how many such men are to be found in the country? Alas! very few. Education, religion and literature are all supposed to furnish worthy ideals to the nation, but in Japan to-day there is nothing more striking than the dearth of such ideals.

The Christian magazines without exception publish much on the new prospects for evangelistic work which Japan's successful war has been the means of opening. But the point of view adopted by the different organs is by no means the same. The December number of the Seikyō Shimpō (Greek Church) in the first of a series of articles on this subject makes the following remarks:—As far as our Church is concerned it is pleasant to be able to say that the war has removed one great disadvantage which we have laboured under. It has always been suspected that we were working in Russian interests, that our religion was inseparably mixed up with politics and that we were the tools of a foreign Power. Our conduct during the war has sufficed to dissipate that notion entirely in the minds of onlookers. This slur on our sincerity and integrity has been effectually removed. The war has acted as a fire to prove to the world the pureness of our Christian gold. Much that we have read on the probable effects of the war on future religious propagandism indicates that many Japanese think that the Gospel message from Japanese lips will have more power now than we have shown that we can fight and organize and manage finances skilfully. This does not follow at all. Though materially the ante-bellum Japan and the post-bellum Japan will be very different, the question for us religious teachers to decide is how far this difference will extend to spiritual things. If the ideals of the nation have not been changed by the war then the war will have brought us little benefit. The Seikyō Shimpō then proceeds to observe that the constant references to 天佑, Ten'yū (Heaven's help) and 神明加護, Shinmei Kago (The protection of the Gods, Providence) indicate that there are a large number of people in this country who believe in the reality of a spiritual world and in the existence of supernatural power of some kind or other. Some have returned thanks for victories at Ise and others at various Hachiman Shrines, which tends to show their belief in the existence of spiritual power outside the physical universe and independent of the laws of nature (To ni kaku kavera wa sehai no ummei ga butsuri hō igwai ni nan ra ka no seiryoku ni yotte shihai seraru mono naru koto wa satoru ni tareri). The war has been the means, then, of arousing an interest in religion which we Christians must use for all it is worth, concludes the Seikyō Shimpō.

The Shinrisō (新理想) is a Roman Catholic monthly magazine which has been recently started. It has only reached its third number. It is especially designed for students. It is edited by Mr. Maeda Chōtarō, and L'Abbe F. Ligneul is a frequent contributor to its pages. Though discussing religious topics, it does not confine itself to them by any means. Education, science, literature, philosophy, history and biography are all to receive attention from its staff of writers in turn. One very useful feature of the magazine is a dialogue printed in French, English, German and Japanese, which is designed to teach religion while it teaches languages. The magazine is nicely printed and contains from month to month a large amount of reading matter suitable for young men. It seems to be very carefully edited.

The Gokyo (Methodist) is above all things else persistent in urging the necessity of certain changes in the Methodist organization and methods of working. It desires to see the various Methodist missions united into one body and thinks that there is no serious obstacle in the way of such a union. Two articles on this subject lie before us, the gist of which we give below:—That our Methodist bodies should long remain in the divided state they are now in is most undesirable. When we compare our Methodist churches with those of the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, we perceive how far ahead of us in the matter of independence, self-support and general efficiency those two bodies are. Taking the three Missions together the original Episcopal Methodists, the Japanese Methodists and what are called the Southern Methodists, and supposing them to unite to-day, how many self-supporting and independent churches would they have? Less than 10. And even these could only be called self-supporting and independent in a very limited sense. They lack the stability of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches. In the case of the latter bodies the churches which are called self-supporting and independent are entirely free from the control of foreign missionaries and receive no pecuniary support from foreign sources. With us it is not so. And yet our churches have a history extending over 30 years. What is the explanation of this fact? In our opinion it can only be accounted for by saying that in our Methodist churches there is a lamentable lack of the spirit of independence among both native pastors and of Christians. Instead of trying to dispense with foreign aid, there is a tendency among some of our followers to rely still more exclusively on it (Wagahai no shinsuru tokoro ni yoreba, konnichi no Methodist Kyōkai ni motomo kakelaruru wa jikyū no seishin (the spirit of self-support) no furuwarazu no ichi ji ni shite, gaishite yonzureba kyōshi no shinto mo, Gwaikoku Dendōkaisha no hojo ni amanai, hanahadashiki ni itatte wa tata masumasu sono hojo wo atogau to suru mono saye naki ni arasu). The feeling that the Church belongs to them and that they must support it prevails to a very limited extent among our Christians. The general sentiment is that Christians are the guests as it were of the Foreign Mission and hence may reasonably expect to be supported. The various Methodist Churches to-day are still under the control of foreign missionaries. What is called the Annual Conference is to all intents and purposes a Foreign Missionary Conference. No change in the canons of the Church can take place without the consent of the foreign missionaries. The fact that the Churches are run by the foreign missionaries accounts for the faint interest taken in their welfare and their status by Church members. Whatever merits individual members of our churches may have, as a body our progress is comparatively very slow, and one of the chief reasons of this is that little power is entrusted to or claimed by our Christians. We can only right matters by freeing ourselves from the control of foreign missionaries. But in order to do this, all Methodist Christians must unite. Amalgamation must come first, self-support and independence will then be within sight. Union at once, then, becomes absolutely necessary to save our churches from the ruin to which they seem to be hastening.

It would seem that the scheme of uniting the various Methodist Churches has been referred to the Foreign Mission Boards concerned, and so in a second article on this subject, published on Nov. 18th, Dr. Takagi, the Editor of the Gokyo, writes as follows concerning the negotiations that have been going on. On inquiry of the Rev. Y. Honda, who has lately returned from America and Canada, as to the progress of the movement for uniting the various Methodist bodies, I was informed by him that the men entrusted with plenary power to negotiate this affair with the home boards regard the matter with considerable indifference. Some of them, Mr. Honda said, seem to have forgotten that they were entrusted with the business of negotiating at all (Naka ni wa jiko no i-inaru koto wo bōkyaku shi itaru mono saye arishi to iu). At first when I heard this I was overcome with astonishment, but when I came to reflect on the history of our church in the past I saw that this indifference to effecting a union of the Methodist sects is no new thing. For years resolutions were passed at our Annual Conferences in favour of the union, but they led to no subsequent practical steps for effecting the amalgamation. With this coldness existing here in Japan, it is hardly surprising that in foreign countries our delegates should have shown lukewarmness. In the last resort it is our Japanese churches that must settle this question. If they are really desirous of union and are prepared to overcome all difficulties in the way of effecting it, then it will come. Unfortunately it is a fact that the delegates did nothing but reflect the state of opinion in our churches regarding the proposed union. They set out on their mission with the feeling that the Japanese Christians who sent them were not at all anxious to see the union effected. Hence the result we see.

Now, in urging the dispensing with foreign financial aid and the freeing of ourselves from the control of foreign missionaries we are actuated by no anti-foreign spirit, as Mr. Takeda Torasaku, whose letter appears in another column, seems to suppose. There is no "Japan for the Japanese" spirit with us, and since religion and politics are quite separate we see no objection on political grounds to our accepting and using foreign money. Our objection to the practice is based solely on the permanent interests of our native churches. Self-governed and self-supporting churches develop and flourish to an extent not even approached by those which are under the control of foreign mission boards. Compare the life of such churches with that of the dependent bodies, compare the annual subscriptions of members to church work, compare the individual characters of the members of the two kinds of churches, and you will see that they are not to be mentioned in the same day. When we argue in favour of the whole management of the churches being placed in Japanese hands, we do not go so far as to say that we must refuse to accept foreign grants-in-aid if they are needed nor do we wish to see the movement marked by any anti-foreign spirit. And as for our relinquishing our Methodist form of Church government in favour of any other existing form, this is unnecessary and undesirable. . . . As regards the inauguration of the union, it certainly ought to be done here. The permission of foreign boards is not required. To us this union appears to be most urgent. We have certainly reached a critical time in the history of Christianity in this country. The pressure from without is such that only the strongest churches can hold their own. The Kumiai Kyōkai and the Nihon Kirisutokyōkai have realized this for some time past and are busy devising measures for deepening the foundations on which their structures rest. There are those who think that no Christian sect can go to ruin; that churches can live on past reputation (Bimeji wo kuan 冠 sureba, metsubō seau); but we are not of that opinion. When development ceases degeneration and decay set in. The Methodist Churches of Japan to-day are stationary. If no immediate steps are taken towards progress, their ruin is certain (Shimpō to hatatsu to kishi gatakuruma, sento metsubō no hoka nashi to ru mo mata nansō kwanon nari to iwan ya?).

As is known to many of our readers the Rev. Y. Honda some time last year started on a European tour which seems to have had for its object the investigation of Christian work and especially European Young Men's Christian Associations. The Gokyo (No. 747) publishes the views of this veteran Christian worker. We extract from the article the following observations. The Young Men's Christian Associations of Europe differ materially from those existing in Japan. Here the members are mostly students. There they consist of business young men, mechanics, and the like. As organizations the European bodies are very much superior to those existing here. The variety of occupation followed by the members is a distinct advantage. Here our work is carried on among too limited a class of young men. . . . A good many Japanese who have returned from European towns have said that Christian influence is on the decline throughout Europe. This is no doubt true to a certain extent. One sees this especially in a country like Italy, where, though priests and nuns swarm, religion has entirely lost its hold on the minds of the people and no longer affects character or morals in any way. But in Germany and England also attendance at church and chapel has fallen off, and difficulty in collecting pew rents is often reported. But when we examine the work carried on by Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, we receive a more favourable impression as to the attitude of the English people to Christianity. The English are naturally a devout people and so, though theoretically many of them may reject the current teaching about God, in their minds there still remains a deep reverence for sacred things. . . . In Europe the Young Men's Societies that are attached to schools and colleges and those organized in towns have no connection. The division between different classes of the community is very marked. The educated for the most part live in a world of their own. There is little fraternization between them and the lower classes. People of education are expected to live like gentlemen and ladies whether they have the money to do so or not. Class distinctions generally are far more marked in Europe than they are in Japan at the present time. There is more conservatism everywhere than we meet with here. . . . I found great ignorance prevailing as to the state of things in Japan; some people imagining that we were such a small nation that every able-bodied man must be liable for military service at such a time as the present, and asking me why I was not at the front.

* "If neither progress nor development can well be expected, then it is no exaggeration to say that nothing but ruin remains for these churches."

It has been often remarked that Japanese are very open-minded and are quite ready to receive instruction from people with whom they have little in common. This was illustrated recently by the action of the Kumiai Kyōkai. We are told by the Krisutokyo Sekai that some little time ago the leading members of the Tōkyō Kumiai Kyōkai assembled for the purpose of listening to a long learned discourse from Dr. Anezaki on "The Incarnation of Buddha and the Incarnation of Christ." The address lasted about 2 hours. After it was over the lecturer submitted to be questioned on topics he had treated. While narrow-minded men condemn this attitude of Christians to outsiders, several writers have commended it as calculated to do much good. Dr. Anezaki has studied religion in a scholarly manner and his views on the deeper questions of life are always worth hearing.

On "The Actual Strength of Churches" the Krisutokyo Sekai writes in the following terms:—That our churches are weak and poor is a fact that is plain to everybody. Notwithstanding that the watchwords "independence and self-support" are heard on all lips, the adoption of the necessary measures for securing them is postponed from one cause and another perpetually. The tendency is to cling to the help given by foreign missionaries. Look where we will we see signs of poverty but no signs of wealth. Our church buildings have nothing stately about them. Our pastors are struggling against numerous difficulties with insufficient means. Though the Church is a spiritual body and depends for its success on spiritual power, yet it stands before the world as an organized corporation and it is naturally expected to have some capital at its back. Though a church can for a while get along without worldly possessions, yet where religion obtains a strong hold on the minds of a large number of people, wealth naturally flows into the coffers of religious teachers. The splendid edifices which adorn Christian countries and our oldest and finest Buddhist temples were erected without difficulty by means of liberal donations received from men and women of faith. How is it that we have to reconcile ourselves to an habitual state of poverty? But while writing thus, we do not forget for a moment that the real strength of the church does not consist in wealth, but in activity, spiritual influence, devotion and zeal. If these things are ours we can bear poverty with equanimity, confident that they will do more for us than any amount of money could possibly do.

The Rikugō Zasshi commands the services of some very able writers and we are pleased to see that it welcomes the contributions of men of all schools of thought. A few months ago Mr. Kuroiwa Shūroku published a very well thought out article on the final stage of religion which we hope to deal with fully in our next Summary. In the November number of the Rikugō Zasshi, Dr. Inoue Enryō writing on "Moral Culture" treats at considerable length the moral development that has been going on in past ages in Japan. The influence of Confucianism and the influence of Buddhism are both clearly set forth. We have only space for the briefest outline of Dr. Inoue's interesting essay. Our traditional morality, says Dr. Inoue, is essentially passive. That taught by Confucianism and that taught by Buddhism both display this quality of passiveness in a marked manner. (Jukyō de toku dotoku mo Bukkyō de toku dotoku mo, moto ni Shōkyoku ni katayori sugite oru to omou). And what I desire to see effected to-day is the recasting of our Buddhist religion so as to make it a thoroughly active faith. The very term we use for moral culture, 修養 Shūyō, is objectionable, because it so smacks of passivity. The ideograph shū essentially bears the meaning of patching up something old rather than creating something entirely new. We have shizen, shūfuku and shūri constantly used of material things. The term shūshin is equally objectionable, as it only represents one side of morality, its passive or less important side. I am for removing the character shū from our ethical terminology. Shūshin I would change to risshin (立身) and shūtoku to 進徳, shintoku, in order if possible to put some activity into our Japanese morality. It is undoubtedly true to say that in addition to this passivity our Confucianism and Buddhism are both characterized by pessimism, asceticism, and reservedness. Now, it seems important to inquire whether the qualities referred to above are essential characteristics of genuine Buddhism or not. The truth is that they are the product of the Shōjō (Sanskrit Hinayana) teaching. By far the greater part of the Daishō, or Mahayana, teaching is essentially active. There are two of our Buddhist sects that profess to teach the highest form of Buddhism, known as Mahayana. They are the Kegon-shū and the Tendai-shū. Undoubtedly it was the intention of the founders of these sects that this should be the role of their followers, but to-day the adherents of these sects are permeated with the pessimism, and the passivity which characterize other Buddhist denominations.*

Having reviewed the teaching of the various Buddhist sects with the purpose of showing that in no case does it come up to the standard required in this go-ahead age, Dr. Inoue concludes his article by expressing the hope that the present unique opportunity of making the influence of Japan's oldest religions felt throughout the East will not be allowed to pass unused. But if this is to happen, these creeds must assume a new character or the spirit of the age will consign them to lasting oblivion.

SHIPPING CASUALTIES.

Fire broke out on the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's chartered steamer Seiko Maru (1,500 tons) on the evening of Dec. 13th while entering the harbour of Chinnampo, Korea. About a hundred packages of cargo were destroyed. Fortunately no severe damage was sustained by the hull. This ship left Kobe on Dec. 6th for Korean ports.

The transport Shimano Maru, with soldiers from the front, collided on the morning of Dec. 15th, with a sailing vessel in Hayatomoto Straits near Shimonoseki. The sailing ship was sunk and three of the crew are missing.

The Fiji has a telegram from Nagasaki stating that the Norwegian steamer Anfrid (?) arrived there on Dec. 16th from Vladivostok. The captain reported that he sighted the British steamer Bonbad (?) on shore in a serious situation and saved the crew, twenty-six in all.

KOBE ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

The report of the Kobe Advisory Committee, presented at a public meeting held on Friday remarked that though happily the war has come to an end the position the local authorities find themselves in does not allow the expenditure of large sums on local improvements, however necessary they may be, owing to the great increase in taxation for Imperial purposes which has occurred as a result of the war, and of which there is not likely to be any immediate diminution. Probably for this reason the Committee were not in a position to congratulate the community on any improvement at the Hatoba or in the facilities for landing passengers. It was to be hoped that the local authorities would take this question into consideration at the earliest possible date and improve the landing facilities which reflect so far little credit on the port of Kobe. The Committee further referred to the danger of the water supply being contaminated from cultivated fields above the reservoir. During the past year applications for a boat shelter and a beer hall on the Bund had been refused on the ground that the erection of buildings might affect the interests of Bund title-deeds holders. An application by the Electric Light Company to erect on the Bund poles upon which to carry wires to supply customers in the Settlement with electric light evoked from the Committee a request that the company should state the cost of placing the wires underground in order to supply present customers. The reply was that it would cost yen 9,183.50 to place the wires underground while by the overhead system the cost would be yen 658.20. The Committee suggested that a less costly method of laying the wires underground might be found. There the matter rested. The Committee also reported with reference to the Kasugano and Ono cemeteries and recapitulated recent events in the history of the House Tax. The report was adopted and the usual complimentary votes passed.

THE DEATH OF MR. WESTERVELD.

It appears that Mr. H. Westerveld, whose death we have already briefly announced, shot himself with a revolver on Thursday afternoon. The act was committed presumably after the two gentlemen with whom he messed had returned to business after tiffin, he staying behind. He had been unwell but no indication was noticeable that could lead any one to suspect his intention. Death was instantaneous. Mr. Westerveld had been seven or eight years in Kobe and was till recently in the firm of Frazer & Co. When that firm was amalgamated with Sale and Frazer, Ltd., he joined Nickel & Co., Ltd. Out of respect to the memory of the deceased, the K. R. & A. C. (of which Mr. Westerveld was a member) postponed until Monday the performance that was to have taken place in the Gymnasium on Friday night. The funeral took place on Saturday morning at Kasugano, being attended by a number of friends.

THE FAMINE IN MIYAGI PROVINCE.

Early in the fall, while many people were glibly saying: "O, there will be a fair crop," the chief paper of Sendai said in a startling editorial: "Let no one be deceived. The loss will be appalling." The last official statement of the rice crop gives less than 15 per cent. of the average, and the consequent loss on this one crop is 14,000,000 yen. The silk crop is the next in value, and on this there is a loss of 4,000,000 yen, making a total loss of 18,000,000 yen in a population of 899,270. This means hard times for even those who are in the best of financial conditions, but for one-third of the population it means a "sentence of death."

One of the great rice plains of Northern Japan is on the coast of Miyagi Province. Here is one of the splendid granaries of the nation. It is a joy to see it in ordinary harvest times. It is a sickening sight to look over it now and contemplate the misery that must follow this failure of the crops.

Every one of the 16 counties, even the best, needs aid on a large scale, without which there will be more loss of life in this one province than fell to the army during the late war. Nay, take the total of killed and wounded on all the battle fields of Manchuria, and this famine will slay more than that total, unless extraordinary assistance is rendered.

Here is what the Chief of Miyagi County says: "This county has a population of 90,674. The average crop of rice is 306,709 koku. This year it is only 7,683. At the price that foreign rice sells, 14 yen a koku, which is much cheaper than Japanese rice, the loss is 1,386,364 yen. This county averages to export 5,974 koku of rice, but its entire crop this year is only 7,683. Simply to save the lives of the people 24,412 koku of rice must be imported, and this must be most economically used by mixing nara nuts, warabe roots, and the powder made by grinding rice straw. The actual number of men, women and children in extreme conditions is 18,155. Hundreds are already forced to eat this ill-looking and unsavory food." One of these combination cakes would gag the average foreigner if put into his mouth.

To get a little nearer the homes of these sufferers, take the worst village in this county, Osawa, with a population of 3,384. The average rice crop is 4,464 koku, but this year's is only 46. The best village is Takajo with 5,009 people. Their average yield is 12,013 koku, but this year's harvest is 1,750.

Look at one more county, Natori, just south of Sendai. It is in a lamentable condition. The polite head of the county will give you every detail of the wretchedness that faces his people. "The population is 57,923. The average rice crop is 84,335 koku, but this year's yield is only 1,211 koku, or less than 1½ per cent. There is one small plot that yielded 3 per cent, and two others 2½ per cent. Such a failure of the main crop is a calamity of the first magnitude. Measured in money it is a loss of 1,163,736 yen. The secondary crop is silk, and the small comfort that comes from the sale of that is 92,900 yen."

Now look at one of the worst villages so far as the rice crop is concerned, Akiho, with its 3,565 people. While their average crop is 3,058 koku this year's yield is only 14. By selling wood and charcoal and by having a few vegetables, this village is raised to the 8th rank among 15 grades of misery.

Everything considered, the most fortunate village in this country is Nkrata with an average crop of 4,581 koku, but harvesting this year only 37. If you ask where is their good fortune, it consists in having cultivated a few more vegetables than the other villages did.

These extreme cases are enough to show the unprecedented loss that has come upon every county in the province. As to plans of relief, we shall say something in a future article. It is sufficient to say here that in spite of an issue of provincial bonds and of borrowed money and exceptional public works for the employment of the poor, and of generous gifts on the part of Japanese all through the Empire, there will be a very wide margin of suffering to which all funds contributed by foreigners will be applied.

J. H. DE FOREST,
For the Foreign Committee of Relief.

REPORT ON FAMINE CONDITIONS IN FUKUSHIMA KEN.

As the result of a visit made at the direction of your committee, the following facts were learned concerning the famine situation in Fukushima Ken.

This Ken comprises one city and seventeen gun, or counties. Roughly speaking, the province is divided into three main sections with natural boundaries; Aizu, embracing the city of Wakamatsu and five counties. Nakadori, or the nine counties lying along the line of the Nippon R.R., and Kaigan Dori, or the three remaining counties along the sea-coast.

The population of Fukushima Ken is a little over 1,000,000; the extent of land under cultivation for rice is a trifle more than 500 sq. miles. The average crop is 1,325,240 koku, worth yen 18,553,360. The crop this year is only 329,938 koku, worth yen 4,619,762.—A loss in rice of 995,302 koku, and in money of yen 13,933,593. This represents an average crop of 25 per cent. for the entire province.

A quarter-crop is bad enough, but that it is even that large is due to the fact that the crop in the Aizu region is comparatively good, about 53 per cent. But if we leave out the five provinces in this section, the average crop for the rest of Fukushima Ken is only 15 per cent. of the yield for an ordinary year. Not only so, but in many places the net result of months of toil in the muddy fields is only 6 per cent. of what the farmers reasonably looked for.

To gain some idea of how this is affecting the people, it will be helpful to notice the fact that 65 per cent. of the rice acreage has produced practically nothing; of this 65 per cent., 43 per cent. is in the hands of the very poor, and the central government has suspended the current taxes. According to a careful estimate made by the heads of the various counties and their sub-officials, there are three hundred thousand souls within the Ken that must receive help in order to live through the coming winter. This does not include those who will suffer comparative loss, but only those who are reduced to extremes. Already thousands are living on fern-roots and the bark of trees mixed with other coarse food. What the suffering will be until the new crops are harvested unless speedy aid is forthcoming, it is easy, though not comforting, to imagine.

At a special meeting of the prefectural assembly, held November 15-25, the following measures of relief were formally adopted.

First of all, looking to the future, the Ken has bought yen 272,000 worth of rice for next year's seed. This is to be distributed gratis to the suffering people, at the rate of about a bushel to an acre, but this will suffice for only the very poorest among those in want.

Besides this, about 30,000 acres of paddy-fields will be made over at an expense of yen 138,000; mulberry trees to the value of 50,000 yen will be given away to provide a means of support when the next silk season comes around.

Yen 26,000 will be spent in repairing the public highways, and in addition to this, half a million yen will be expended in various kinds of public works in order to provide employment for the vast numbers of people who must perforce look for a livelihood. Half of this amount will be raised by the Ken, and the other half by the towns and villages.

This means that the Ken will have to bond itself for at least yen 460,000 not counting the quarter of a million for seed-rice which will be provided out of present assets. This much for the authorities: in many places local committees of relief have been organized, and the work of caring for the destitute will be taken up in systematic form. But with all that they can possibly do, there will be a wide margin of desperate need which calls for prompt action on the part of those who are moved by humanitarian impulses.

What makes this famine doubly hard to bear is the fact that the silk crop this year was only half the average output, thus bringing additional burdens upon the people.

As a result of the grain famine there is likely to be an educational famine, in fact it is already here; in many places the number of teachers has been reduced by one half, in others the schools have been closed. The number of pupils is diminishing daily, partly because the children have nothing to take for their lunches, and partly because they must stop studying to help the rest of the family find something to eat.

These facts were given to me in the course of interviews with Vice-Governor Kikuchi, and the heads of various departments of administration. I was amazed at the thorough organization for gathering statistics and applying aid which this visit revealed. It is no wonder that the army and navy of this country work with the smoothness of an engine, for they are even more highly developed.

Vice-Governor Kikuchi said to me, "May, June and July of next year is the time above all others when we shall be most anxious. At present we can provide work to keep the people from actual starvation for there is imported rice to be had if only the people have money to buy it with, but next spring when they must plant the new rice crop and tend to the silk-worms and mulberry trees, they will have no time to do the work that for the present may supply their daily food. Then is the time when we must appeal most strongly, and depend on outside benevolence."

Surely here is a condition of things at our very doors that calls forth our deepest sympathy, and demands that we do our utmost for the sake of starving humanity. At this season when we are thinking with anticipation of Christmas dinners, let us remember the thousands of poor people who are now living on the most meagre kind of rations, and do not know for sure where tomorrow's food is to come from.

C. S. DAVISON,
For the Famine Relief Com. of Foreigners.

FAMINE CONDITIONS IN IWATE PROVINCE.

Iwate province is facing a serious famine. The rice crop that in an average year yields to the province a resource of yen 6,857,770 has this year only yielded a return of yen 2,314,920. Here is a loss in money of yen 4,542,850. The rice cultivation in the province covers an area of 51,539 cho (one cho 2.45 acres.) Of this acreage, the greater part lies in the southern part of the province where the yield has been the poorest. What adds to the distress is that, here where the yield has been the poorest, only 1/3 of a crop, lives the far greater portion of the 749,927 population of the province; in fact here where probably 90 per cent. of the people live there is but a little over (20 per cent.) of a crop. While the average for the whole province is but a fraction over 33 per cent. For a more concrete illustration of the distress that is facing this province let us consider the conditions that exist in one district. Take for instance Nishi Iwai district. It has a population of 50,357. Its average rice crop is 55,218 koku. This year its crop was only 12,424 koku. It is estimated that in this district alone at least 5650 people will be brought to extreme distress. The only way they will be able to live at all will be through Government and other aid. In addition to these large numbers will doubtless have to be helped before Spring. To simply maintain the lives of sufferers that are already in sight in this district alone counting at the meagre rate of 5 sen per day for each person, yen 59,525.00 will be needed; while the actual amount needed will be much more.

The provincial authorities are very loath to make any estimate as to the number of people in the province that will have to be helped if they are to be able to live through the severe Winter of this cold North. Yet they do not hesitate to say, that it is already evident that 112,600 people are going to be brought to untold suffering. Early in the Fall when it was evident that the rice crop was going to be a failure the authorities removed all restrictions relative to entering the Government forest reserves and for weeks thousands of people have been hunting the forests for "warabe," fern roots and eatable barks of trees. As yet not many are reduced to this as their only diet, but it is necessary to get them picked before the heavy December snows cover them up. Yet as the Winter comes on this will be the only food that multitudes will have, except as it is furnished by the Government and the gifts of Japanese and foreign givers.

The provincial authorities are fully awake to the distress that is staring the people in the face. For measures of relief they propose to spend yen 101,753 on public works. They will also spend yen 4,500 in rearranging paddy fields, and they expect to assist the various counties and villages to borrow from Tokyo banks the sum of yen 300,000 to be used for the same purpose. However not all of the last two sums can be used to give work to the sufferers because here some skilled labour will have to be employed. In order to provide seed for next year's planting 105,000 yen will be used. As the children are quitting school because they have no lunches to bring the authorities have bought 20,000 pounds of army biscuit, to distribute among the school children. It is proposed to give them three of these biscuits each for their mid-day meal. In this way it is hoped the schools can be kept going. Here then is the situation. Twelve out of the thirteen counties of the province are in the area where the rice crop has wholly or partially failed. Already it is evident that about one out of every seven of the population will have to be helped if they shall not starve to death. More detailed information will be available later on. Surely here is a cry from suffering humanity that we can not turn a deaf ear to. When I asked the Governor, just how much money he thought would be needed to relieve the coming distress, he replied, "Really the people of this province are so poor and have to live so close anyhow, that the loss of any of the shortage of 4,543,650 yen will mean suffering." From this we can judge the need and the magnitude of it. From this statement we can also see the need of liberal giving on the part of the foreigners residing in Japan.

WILLIAM AXLING,

In behalf of the Foreign Committee of Relief.
Morioka, Dec. 15, 1905.

THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

By kind hospitality of Rev. A. F. King, the Annual General Meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held at St. Andrew's House, Tokyo, on Wednesday, December 13th, at four o'clock. The President, Professor Lloyd, announced that the minutes of the last meeting had been published, and so need not be read. He said that it would be convenient to have other business precede the reading of the paper set for the meeting. He then asked the Secretary to read the REPORT OF COUNCIL.

In 1905 there have been eight Council Meetings, four General Meetings and one Special General Meeting of the Society. At General Meetings papers were read as follows: February 17, by Professor A. Lloyd, "Kokoro: A Modern Japanese Play." May 17, by Professor E. W. Clement, "British Sailors and Mito Samurai in 1824." November 15, by Professor A. Lloyd, "Village Life in Japan." To-day, by Rev. J. L. Atkinson, D.D., "Japanese Popular Buddhism." At a Special General Meeting in Yokohama on February 14, Professor Lloyd read his paper on "Kokoro: A modern Japanese play."

The Society has this year published volume XXXII, containing papers on "The Life of Watanabe Noboru" by Miss Ballard and "Dazai no Bubi" by R. J. Kirby, Esq.; also volume XXXIII, part I, containing "A Modern Japanese Play" by Professor Lloyd and "British Seamen and Mito Samurai in 1824" by Professor Clement. The paper for to-day and other matter are available for another number to form part 2 of volume XXXIII. Furthermore, the Society has reprinted Vol. XII, part 4, Vol. VIII, part 2; is now re-printing Vol. III, part 3 (almost finished), Vol. X, Supplement; and is about to reprint Vol. XVII, part 2. For next year, the Society has already in prospect several papers.

In the death of Dr. Davidson MacDonald, the Society lost a valued member and also its Vice-President for Tokyo. By removal from Japan of Rev. Walter Weston, a vacancy was created among ordinary members of Council. Neither of the vacancies thus created was filled by Council.

The Council has about completed plans for moving into quarters which will be much more convenient in location and in appointments and which will afford much greater facilities for the use of the library. The catalogue of the library has been completely revised.

An unusually large net increase of membership is the result of changes during the year. The Society lost seven members: three resignations and four deaths, one of the latter an honorary member. Additions were twenty-five: one renewal of lapsed membership and twenty-four new members. Of the twenty-four new members, seventeen are resident in Japan. Of the seven new non-resident members two are life members. Details follow:—

New members, Resident:—Thos. B. Blow, Esq., Geo. H. Scidmore, Esq., Brig. C. Duce, Lieut. R. Brelinzky, Oscar White, Esq., C. B. Sansom, Esq., Miss Lida H. Smith, K. Jan Hora, Esq., Edward Mendelson, Esq., Pastor J. Oswald, Rev. C. H. Shoritt, G. S. Phelps, Esq., Huntington Wilson, Esq., Rev. Edward S. Cobb, Professor M. Shiozawa, Professor Ujio Motora, Ralph Walter, Esq.

Non-Resident:—K. Asakawa, Esq., Lieut. L. Crawford, Professor L. Batalha, W. P. Hubbard, Esq., John R. Patterson, Esq., Alfred Owre, Esq., Lieut. Peter Blavenez, Renewal, Ernest James, Esq., Resigned, Rev. C. H. B. Wood, R. Rev. Bishop Francis, Miss Schereschewsky, Died, Rev. Jos. Edkins, D.D. hon. mem. Dr. Davidson MacDonald, W. H. Examined the above and found the same to correspond with the vouchers and Banks' accounts.

RICHARD J. KIRBY,
J. T. SWIFT.

Tokyo, December 9th, 1905.

Next followed the Report of the Librarian:—
As Librarian of the Society for the year now past I have the honour to report as follows:

(I) Vol. XXXII, containing the Transactions for 1904, and Vol. XXXIII, part I, containing the Transactions for the first half of 1905, have been printed and distributed amongst the members.

A second volume containing papers read since that time, is now ready, and will shortly be sent to the printer.

Yet a third volume, published as an appendix, will contain Sir Ernest Satow's translation of the Nihongaishi, which was first published in the Japan Mail in its early days, and is now to be reprinted in our Transactions with the author's kind permission.

(II) Vol. VIII, part 2, and Vol. XII, part 4, have been reprinted and added to our stock. Vol. X Supplement, Vol. III Supplement, and Vol. IX part 1, are now in the printers' hands. I may add that during the coming year a great deal of reprinting will have to be done. Fortunately our funds will allow of this.

(III) Last year the Treasurer's books showed for sales of Transactions yen 249.25, while the Librarian's Sale Book for the same period showed yen 423.36, the discrepancy being accounted for by the fact that a considerable time often elapses between the despatch of an order and the receipt of the payment. This year the Treasurer's books give for sales of Transactions yen 636.13, while mine show the large sum of yen 1,335.51, so that we ought to be able to look forward to an increased income in the next year.

(IV) Very little, only yen 27.20, has been spent on the purchase of books. With our present limited accommodation it has seemed futile to do so. With the hopes of a new domicile, we may look forward to an enlarged library to meet the wants of the larger life that is opening before us as a Society.

ARTHUR LLOYD.

13 Dec., 1905.

After hearing the reports, members balloted for officers and members of Council for the next year. The result of the election was later announced:—

President, H.E. Sir Claude MacDonald.
Vice-Presidents: for Tokyo, Professor A. Lloyd; for Yokohama, Consul-General J. C. Hall.
Corresponding Secretary, E. H. Vickers, Esq.
Recording Secretaries:—For Tokyo, E. H. Vickers, Esq.; for Yokohama, Dr. J. L. Dearing.
Treasurer, J. McD. Gardiner, Esq.
Librarian, Professor Lloyd.
Members of Council:—B. H. Chamberlain, Esq., J. H. Gubbins, Esq., Dr. D. C. Greene, Rev. A. F. King, Professor J. T. Swift, R. J. Kirby, Esq., R. S. Miller, Esq., Professor E. C. Clement, Rev. H. H. Guy, and Rt. Rev. Bishop Awdry.

The President then introduced Dr. D. C. Greene who read, with some omissions, a paper prepared by Rev. J. L. Atkinson, D.D., on "Japanese Popular Buddhism: The Ten Virtues" (Juzen-Hogo)—a summary of which follows:—

The title of the book from which the following discourse is taken is "Juzen-ho-go," which may be translated as "The Word of the Law of the Ten Virtues."

The Juzen or Ten Virtues are these

1. Fu-sessho, that is Not killing.
2. Fu-chu-to " Not stealing,
3. Fu-ja-in " Not committing adultery.
4. Fu-mo-go " Not lying,
5. Fu-ki-go " Not exaggerating.
6. Fu-akko " Not slandering or reviling.
7. Fu-tyo-zetsu " Not double-tongued,
8. Fu-ton-yoku, " Not coveting,
9. Fu-shin-i " Not being angry,
10. Fu-ja-ken " Not heretical.

The Ju-aku or Ten Vices are the opposites of the above.

The sermon on the "Fu-sessho-kai" or "Not Killing" is an introduction to the entire course on the Ten Virtues. It was preached about A. D. 1773; the preacher was Katsuragi-jin.

THE FIRST VIRTUE: NOT KILLING.

Man's path or duty consists in nothing else than in the observance of the ten virtues. Any one thus faithful can thereby attain to the quality and rank of a sage and of a Buddha. A sacred book says that it is a virtue to train one's mind in accordance with and in obedience to reason and that the opposite of it is a vice. Conduct conforming to the principles of reason in its relations to the three bodily, the four lingual, and the three intellectual activities constitutes the ten virtues. This obedience to reason is nothing less than neither increasing nor decreasing nature. It is the maintaining of it in equilibrium. When bodily act, speech and thought are in accord with one's original nature then there result in perfection the ten virtues. Conduct in opposition to reason means self-ness. When the original nature is modified or perverted by this self-ness, then the ten vices result. Goodness or virtue is always in accord with the nature of Buddha, while vice is non-accorded to it.

If man was non-existent there could be no Path or Duty of Man. This path must therefore be sought in man himself. Only those who are misled by their own false ideas go astray. The substance of what Buddha taught is involved in these words, "All the three worlds are mine and all living things in them are my children." In the first of them, the world of desire, yokukai, there are food, sleep and sex desires. In the second of them, the world of forms—sishikai—they and the mind harmonize with the higher thought, the result of the abstract meditation of the ascetic. In the third of them the world of non-forms—mushiki-kai, the mind, separating from the form body harmonises with space—toku or voidness. In these three worlds the ten virtues are perfected and all the living things in them are as Buddha said, his own children. When seeing, hearing and perceiving are in accord with the Great Path, there is no birth, no extinction, no coming, no departing, and body and mind rejoice in form, sound, smell and taste and all harmonizes with the mysterious reasons, (myoga). The mountains, the rivers and the earth become, or are, one's own body. The trees, the groves, the grass and the meadows become one's own body. They thus become one's own possessions. The ideas and conceptions of all living things become similarly one's own, and peace and deliverance, destruction and confusion, together with the conviction of truth become also one's own. This is what is meant by the Buddha's words, "all living things are my children."

Shallow thinkers imagine that what they do not take into their own hands or do not themselves see, can not be said to be their own. It is, however, a great mistake. A man of great wealth does not always carry his riches in his purse or bosom. Still he is its owner. Kings and emperors do not know the amount of wealth possessed by their own people, yet they are still sovereign over it and them. By these examples we can understand what is meant by the teaching that all living things are one's own children. Thus it is also with the heaven of Brahma-Bonten, although one may not ascend to it, yet if his conduct is perfect his joy is as that of meditation in that heaven. Although one may not see the world of non-form yet it is one's own possession. All warriors and wise men are one's own though their power and wisdom may be greatly superior to one's own. The noble and the rich as well as the ignoble and the poor are also one's own. Because of this fact that all living things are one's own children, there is the commandment about "not-killing" any living thing.

The relation of parent and child is a most intimate one. The true meaning of this metaphor involves the making of the ideas and feelings of living things one's own. One's own mind and that of others are equal and without distinction (hedate nashi). When any living thing comes into one's sight a feeling of pity, or regard, springs up in the mind. This we call the heart of the (Bodhisatva Hosatsu) and it is in itself the commandment "not killing." Although the Bodhisatva mind exists from the very beginning in living things it does not readily or immediately appear because of confused idea and sins. Still it exists and is in its nature perfect. The inclination to keep the commandments that is aroused when sermons are listened to is evidence of the original and perfect Buddha nature that is in inherent in man.

As the three worlds with all their wealth and rank are one's own possessions there is as concerning these things the commandment "not stealing" and more, the noble and thoughtful man receiving liberty through perception sees that, as the canon says, "The world of mountains, rivers, whole plains, grasses, groves, plants and trees are equal and without difference from the beginning" and that they are his own person or body (shinrai). Therefore as a valley does not envy the weight of a mountain nor a mountain the depth of a valley, for each is content with his own characteristic, so those who have rank and wealth possess them as the happy fruit of loyalty to the Buddha nature and law that is within them. This is the significance of the Commandment "Not Stealing."

Because of the statement "all living things are my children," there is concerning the relation of the sexes, the commandment "Not committing adultery." The phrase "My children" as used in this connection is intended to show the purity of the relationship that should exist between the sexes. That is the relationship should be as pure as that between parent and child.

All lies are despicable. Those who utter them deceive themselves before they deceive others. If one makes the doing of Duty, the keeping of "Man's path his delight," he will be free from the use of exaggeration and lies.

It is folly to be envious of the pleasures of others. If one has clear understanding there can be no occasion for wishing that the pleasures of others could be our own. Princes have their provinces and people for their delight; officials, farmers, artisans and merchants have their respective offices and labours for their delight, while priests have their ascetic meditations and wisdom for their pleasure and satisfaction. If one neither envies nor dislikes others he will not be in danger of slandering any. If one desires to be on terms of intimacy with others, he must not be double tongued. If one is the father of all living things then "all living things" are brothers. There is no parent who does not rejoice when his children are on terms of intimacy with each other. Confucius says "all of the four seas are brothers." One who clearly perceives that poverty and wealth, nobility and commonality in station are only the shadows of the nature of deeds in a previous life is always content with his own position in life. This is the basis of the virtue "not coveting."

When one can find pleasure in everything, the spirit of anger is easy to repress. Anger arises from mental distress or annoyance, which has its root in evil desires. If one can find pleasure in everything he will be free from evil desires, and from the mental disturbance without which anger never arises.

If one does not doubt that the Great Path is his own, he will be able to keep the precept, "Not holding heretical views." A person's thoughts are all originated by his own nature. If through nature self has exclusive control, one is in danger of forming false conceptions concerning real or material existence and ideal or non-material existence; yet if one receives and is guided by the sacred law he will be enabled to hold an impartial view of existence which is neither actual or ideal, neither existence (yu) nor non-existence (mu).

The canon says, "The path of the ten virtues leads to and ensures entrance into man's heaven—that is the highest heaven. Those who perfectly observe the ten precepts attain to the rank of sovereign in various heavens; those who less perfectly observe them attain to the rank of sovereigns among men; while those who keep them in a yet less perfect manner, attain only to positions of wealth and honor among men. Yet it is also true that those who even very imperfectly obey them do not fail of attaining to some reward.

On the other hand, those who violate the ten precepts the most completely fall into the most awful of the hells; those who are less vicious fall into the hells of famishing demons. The worldly wise are apt to think and to say that the various hells do not exist, that they are things of the imagination only and that they are used solely to intimidate people. They are, however, mistaken. If one truly believes in the mystery nature of the law Ho he certainly knows that the hells are really existent though he cannot see them with his eyes of flesh.

The question may be asked "Why are there such places as these hells and such creatures as famishing demons?" The reply is this: They exist because of our own vices and evil deeds and are the result of them. Take for instance the vice of killing any living thing. Dying is the extreme of all pain. When one suffers from fever is there not pain? The sick of every kind and the aged cannot escape pain. How much more grievous must be the pain of any healthy vigorous living thing when it is ruthlessly slain. If man who holds such an exalted position kills any creature in order to gratify a cruel lust, his evil deed will most surely bring evil consequences to himself. All things are equal and coordinate; every effect has its legitimate cause and every action bears its appropriate fruit therefore the character of all human deeds is endlessly self-propagating. It follows then that one guilty of killing any living thing must bear the consequences, that is the suffering involved in that act as fruitage is involved in the seed that is sown when the cause, the evil deed, has been done, the effect, the punishment, must inevitably follow.

Evil deeds are classified according to the intention of those who do them as superlatively wicked, mediately wicked and averagely wicked.

By killing we mean the destruction of any sentient thing that has knowledge and affection. Killing a human being is great murder daisesho; killing animals is small murder—shosesho. These two classes are again subdivided. The killing of one's father, one's parent, sages, priests and men of distinction is the worst kind of "great murder." The killing of ordinary men is the lighter kind of murder. The killing of dragons and other creatures that can change their forms is the heaviest kind of small murder. The killing of sentient beings which can not transform themselves is the lightest sin of small murder. One who slays a man receives the worst punishment and is incapable of receiving the teachings of Buddha and of becoming one of the lowest class of his followers—a "Biku." One who has killed an animal may regain his purity by confessing his sin, after which he can enter the lower class of Buddha's followers and may also become a benefactor of human-kind.

One's own benevolence is increased through there being other living things. The troubles of this evil world are aids to the perfecting of one's benevolence and morality. It is not strange that one has a heart of patience and benevolence when associating only with sages and devout men; patience and benevolence are perfected by their exercise towards those who are ungrateful and unkind to us. We are to be patient with and kind to even the proud and the haughty. Wherever there is a living thing, benevolence and patience are to be exercised and one who does so is a true or perfect keeper of the commandment "not killing." We must esteem both our superiors and inferiors. We must esteem the wise and pity the ignorant. This does not mean that wicked deeds are to be esteemed, but that even evil doers are to be regarded with benevolence.

The last part of the sermon discusses the difference between the nature of men and animals and shows how the commandments grow out of man's nature and how the keeping of them is to be expected of him as it never could be of the animals. We give one instance: "Man has a soft, yielding and expressive countenance. He has no claws, no horns, no tusks. Animals are not so, they constantly attack each other. Through these differences are seen the nature and the value of the commandment, "not killing."

At the conclusion of the paper the Chairman said that he was sure he was expressing the sense of the meeting in thanking both Dr. Atkinson for writing, and Dr. Greene for reading, the paper to which they had just been listening with so much interest. As he listened to it himself he had some doubts as to the name of the paper, "Popular Buddhism"—"Practical Buddhism" would have been a better title, the Sermon contained in the paper being far too learned to be termed popular. He might call attention to a Society called, the Jusen Kwai, which existed in Tokyo some ten years or so ago. The Magazine of that Society, Jusen Kwai Zasshi, might still be seen in second hand book shops from time to time, and was quite worthy of being studied. He did not think that the last of the Buddhist Commandments was quite correctly rendered by the speaker. To him it seemed that the fault condemned by that precept was the partial or prejudiced mind which will only look at one side of any question, the contrary virtue being the "open mind" which can alone arrive at the truth, and which was so well exemplified in this country in the early years of Meiji when the Government sent its students abroad into all countries to gather information from everywhere.

After expressing the thanks of the Society to Rev. A. J. King and the other gentlemen of St. Andrew's House for their kind entertainment, the President declared the meeting adjourned.

MEN'S READING ROOM ASSOCIATION.

The second meeting of the season of the above Association was held on Tuesday night. Rules to govern future meetings were discussed and adopted. A debate followed on the question "Is War Justifiable." Dr. Dearing led for the affirmative whilst Mr. P. E. Nicolle opened for the negative, their supporters being respectively Mr. F. S. Booth and Mr. P. L. Smith. The subsequent discussion was taken part in by Rev. E. S. Booth, Messrs. T. Cowen, C. Griffin, Macbride and J. P. Webb.

YOKOHAMA YACHT CLUB.

The annual general meeting of the Yokohama Yacht Club was held in the Masonic Hall, No. 78, on Tuesday at 5.30 p.m. Mr. G. H. Scidmore, Commodore, presided and there were over twenty members present.

On the motion of Mr. CATTO seconded by Mr. Laffin the minutes of the last meeting were taken as read.

The next business was consideration of the report and accounts, which were taken as read, having been circulated among the members.

The CHAIRMAN said it would be seen that while they had at the close of the previous year a credit balance of yen 55.86, they had at the close of this year a balance of yen 103.46. Their policy heretofore had been to have a clean balance sheet, going on from year to year without carrying anything over, spending their money as fast as they got it in encouraging sailing. This year, however, it had been thought expedient to retain a small balance for the purpose of meeting the expenses always necessary at the beginning of the season. These had always hitherto been advanced out of the private purse of the Hon. Treasurer, and the Committee considered it hardly fair to impose that burden upon him. One very encouraging feature in their history during the past year had been the absence of protests. During the earlier years of the Club, as they might remember, these were of weekly occurrence and there were sometimes several in a race. This year fortunately there had not been any, and he was informed by the Racing Committee that in some instances competitors had protested against themselves. Another feature of the past season, however, was to be regretted—the diminution of interest in the Lark class. The Committee regarded this class as one of the best features introduced into their racing during the past few years. The boats were handy, safe, of small cost and easily managed by amateurs, and they had a tendency to encourage the younger members of the club to engage in yachting with enthusiasm. They had given great sport but unfortunately during the past year—owing mainly to the fact that a few of the boats nearly always were winners, which the Committee attributed to a large extent to the ability of the skippers, for it was not believed that there was any difference in the boats—the continued success of certain skippers coming in first and winning prizes had discouraged many of the other members. They thought this was a mistake, and hoped the incoming racing committee would bend their energies towards encouraging this class because it was the nursery of the club. He might say further that in consequence of the war a certain amount of restrictions had been placed on the permits given for cruising but he was led to believe that these restrictions would be greatly relaxed, and they would have opportunities of having cruising races to Uruga and other places outside the Saratoga Spit. In this connection he would like to say that since he had the honour of being Commodore he had done his best to arouse interest among his Japanese friends, and he was pleased to say that he thought in the near future they would have assistance to a certain extent in yachting, which would greatly encourage them. It was to be hoped they would see a Japanese yacht club organised, which would give them an opportunity of competition, would spread interest in the sport, and might be the means of increasing their facilities outside the bay, and generally the objects of the club might be furthered. One reason which, he thought, had militated against the interest that local Japanese should take in yachting was the fact that many of the wealthier Japanese and those of the leisured classes, who had been abroad and seen yachting in other countries, were residents of Tokyo, and as the meeting knew Tokyo was unfortunately located on very shallow waters. But with the extension of summer resorts and trolley lines, communication with the coast and the erection of small villas along the coast he was led to believe that more interest would be taken in yachting by Japanese. They had the pleasure of a visit during the summer from the Commodore of the Shanghai Yacht Club, who took a great interest in this club and its work and was endeavouring to arrange for an interport race. It was understood he or others in Shanghai would send over to Yokohama a yacht to compete with some of our cracks. It was probable the craft would be a centre-board, cabin sloop of about 27 rating and it was now a question whether any of the members of this club were prepared to build and meet this challenge. An interesting feature of his visit was a prize which he offered for competition by 21 raters with no sendoes on board, the work to be done entirely by owners or members. He (the Chairman) thought this was an excellent idea and that such competitions should be repeated as often as possible. There was too much tendency to leave everything to the sendoes, to come down to the hatoba, get into a dinghy, go on board and take the tiller, the sendo doing all the work. The incoming committee would have to consider a question that had been raised of reviving the old 26 class and doing away with the cruising class. The meeting would have to discuss for the information of the committee the question of altering the record points, the manner of awarding which he described. Finally, he said, the committee would have to buy a new gun unless some enthusiastic member would present one.

On the motion of Mr. T. Herlihy seconded by Mr. S. H. Dawes the report and accounts were adopted.

An addition to Rule 13 was then proposed by Mr. A. R. Catto seconded by Mr. A. Owston, by which the last sentence of the rule reads (the added portion being italicised):

"Any member of the Kobe Sailing Club or Shanghai Yacht Club, temporarily visiting Yokohama shall be entitled to the privileges of an honorary member on notifying the Honorary Secretary of his visit to Yokohama."

The election of officers and members of committees resulted as follows:—Commodore, Mr. G. H. Scidmore; Vice-Commodore, Capt. Weston; Hon. Secretary, Mr. G. W. Brockhurst; Members of Committee, Mr. T. M. Laffin and Mr. R. Boyes; Racing Committee, Mr. F. H. Abbey, Mr. A. R. Catto, and Mr. J. J. Drummond.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the record prize flags for the season were presented by one of their few active Japanese members, Mr. K. Kutsuma.

On the suggestion of the CHAIRMAN, the Official Measurer, Capt. Olsen, was re-elected by acclamation accompanied by a vote of thanks for his past services.

The CHAIRMAN thanked the members for the honour they did him in electing him for the seventh time Commodore, and said he would do everything in his power to advance the interests of the club and would try to give satisfaction during the coming year. Some discussion then took place as to record points and the condition of the Lark class but no formal decision was arrived at, the raising of these subjects being for the guidance of the incoming committee. Among those who spoke were Messrs. Catto, F. J. Hall, C. Thwaites, E. R. Thompson, and H. A. Poole.

Votes of thanks to the Chairman and to the Hon. Secretary concluded the meeting.

NIPPON RACE CLUB.

The annual general meeting of members of the Nippon Race Club was held on Wednesday in the Club Hotel. Dr. E. Wheeler, Vice-President, was in the chair and there was a large attendance, the chair being supported by the Executive Committee—Messrs. A. J. Easton, T. C. Anderson, F. H. Bugbird, V. A. Caesar-Hawkins, and K. Mori.

The CHAIRMAN intimated that owing to pressure of engagements the President, Sir Claude MacDonald, was unable to be present.

On the motion of Mr. A. J. McClure, seconded by Mr. A. J. Easton, the minutes of last meeting were taken as read.

The CHAIRMAN said—Gentlemen:—The Report and Accounts have been in your hands for some days past. Before putting them before this meeting, I am going to take the opportunity of performing a pleasing duty which it is my privilege to do. As you all know, our friend Mr. Mori has for some years past served the Nippon Race Club, on the Permanent, as well as Executive Committees, and it has always fallen to his lot to do a great deal of work, and devote an immense amount of time in the interests of the Club. This year his services have been called upon to an extent almost beyond what could have been expected from any gentleman, and as a result of his labours, the Club has become possessed of the property inside the Race Course. The task of purchasing this property can best be appreciated when I tell you that 77 owners had to be brought together; this was successfully done by Mr. Mori, whom I am going to ask to accept this token of the Club's thanks and esteem. (Loud Applause).

Mr. MORI briefly thanked the Club in Japanese for the beautiful present.

The gift consisted of three gold cups bearing Mr. Mori's crest and the inscription:—

"Presented to Mr. Kengo Mori by the Nippon Race Club in appreciation of special services rendered by him to the Club during the year 1905."

The stand that bore them was of black lacquer relieved by gold lines and it also had Mr. Mori's mon.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed the adoption of the Report and Accounts.

Mr. J. DE CUERS DE COGOLIN seconded and the Report and Accounts were adopted.

Mr. LEFEBER called attention to the fact that the Permanent Committee had power to undertake any extraordinary expenditure without reference to an extraordinary meeting of members. He proposed alterations the chief of which was that the consent of the members should be obtained to the spending of money for extraordinary purposes. He did not object to the way in which it had been done, but to the principle of the thing. Under the rules extraordinary expenditures could be referred to the Permanent Committee and they had the power to pass them.

The CHAIRMAN said it had always been so.

Mr. LEFEBER asked that his proposal should be put to the vote.

Mr. MARSHALL said this meeting was not empowered to make any proposition whatever. If Mr. Lefebere wished to have any rule altered he must take it to the Permanent Committee.

Mr. LEFEBER said that was rather an extraordinary position for a club.

Mr. MARSHALL said yes but those were the rules under which Mr. Lefebere joined the Club.

Mr. LEFEBER—Under these rules members have not the right of calling an extraordinary meeting? ("Yes" "Yes.")

Mr. MARSHALL—You can always call such a meeting. But you had far better take up the matter with the Permanent Committee.

Mr. LEFEBER asked if an extraordinary meeting could be held after this meeting.

Mr. MARSHALL pointed out that notice must be given. In any case the Permanent Committee must consider any alterations.

Mr. LEFEBER—Then this rule or these rules cannot be altered for the next hundred years?

Mr. MARSHALL said mention was made in the report of a new constitution for the Club and the present rules would have to be very materially altered. The Articles of Association were now in the hands of the authorities in Tokyo and a favourable reply was expected at any moment. In fact he had been told the same day by their lawyer that it was morally certain the application would be accepted before the end of the year. The rules must be revised in accordance with Japanese law. Therefore the matter Mr. Lefebere referred to would be covered by the new articles.

Mr. LEFEBER said these again were drawn up by the Permanent Committee.

Mr. MARSHALL said it was not the rules but the Articles of Association that were before the authorities.

Mr. LEFEBER—Precisely, but our rules and byelaws will be the same.

Mr. MARSHALL—They must be in accordance with the Articles of Association.

Mr. LEFEBER—In what way can my proposition be put before you?

Mr. MARSHALL—Under the new Articles a general meeting can pass upon these rules.

Original from

Mr. LEFEBER—If you promise that now—

Mr. MARSHALL—I promise nothing.

Mr. LEFEBER then asked whether he could distinctly understand that the new rules and Articles of Association will be put before a general meeting.

The CHAIRMAN said certainly.

Mr. WARD suggested that when the Club had work to do it should advertise in the foreign as well as in the Japanese papers so that foreign contractors might bid. He added that before going into any large work the Club should offer a prize of yen 500 for the best design, then call for tenders and let everybody have a chance.

The CHAIRMAN said the suggestions were noted.

Mr. WARD went on to remark that they were getting some 20 more China ponies while there had been a thousand Japanese ponies back from the war sold at from 15 to 60 yen. These were not racing ponies but they were as good as China ponies. Four hundred had been sold at Hiratsuka the other day. One would get one's money back after the races instead of getting yen 25 for horses that yen 200 were paid for.

Mr. EASTON proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman of the Executive Committee. The work that he had to do during the past year was both heavy and tedious on account of the land purchased inside the Race Course. That was the reason he personally got out of it (Laughter.) Many of them knew what work they had when they got into the hands of a lawyer. He proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Duke Marshall.

Mr. WARD seconded, and the Chairman in declaring it passed remarked that Mr. Marshall was a hard-working fellow and a good sport.

Mr. MARSHALL, in acknowledging, said he was so thoroughly keen on racing and everything pertaining to it that he was only too glad to serve the Club.

On the motion of Mr. WARD seconded by Mr. de Cuers de Cogolin a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Easton, in announcing which,

The CHAIRMAN said, Mr. Easton had done and was doing a great deal for the benefit of the Club.

Mr. EASTON—I beg to thank you (Applause.)

Mr. MARSHALL said it had been suggested to him—he did not in any way advocate it—that instead of as at present two successive Fridays and Saturdays they should race on six successive Saturday afternoon ("No" "No"). He personally did not think it quite feasible because their present Club would thus become a professional affair. And it would be hard on trainers, who could not keep their ponies in training for six weeks.

Mr. McCLURE said it would also be hard on the owners and on the Committee. He did not think if an owner raced his pony twice and found it was no good that he would keep it over for the other four weeks.

Mr. LEFEBER thought the practice should remain as it was, and this appearing to be the general feeling of the meeting the matter dropped.

It was announced that the election of the Executive Committee had resulted as follows: Messrs. T. C. Anderson, V. Blad, A. J. Easton, V. A. Caesar-Hawkins, D. Marshall, K. Mori, and S. Isaacs.

A vote of thanks to the CHAIRMAN on the motion of Mr. Caesar-Hawkins brought the meeting to a close.

The following is the Annual Report for 1905:—The Committee have the pleasure of submitting to the members of the Club the Report and Accounts for 1905.

His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor, has again graciously honoured the Club, by presenting Prizes both for the Spring and Autumn Meetings. The Emperor's Cup has twice been run for under fixed conditions, these are now laid down for the future.

The Fixed Skeleton Programme has continued to give satisfaction, there has been a marked increase in the number of horses and every indication of a further increase next year. The Four Days' Meetings initiated last year have also, by the public, been confirmed a success.

Rule No. 108 has been altered, with the sanction of the Permanent Committee, particulars were duly advised to all members.

The Executive in concordance with the Permanent Committee, subscribed on behalf of the Club, through His Excellency Governor Suifu, towards charities for the relief of Sufferers by the War, yen 3,000, out of the takings of the last two meetings.

With the approval of the Permanent Committee, the Executive have at last been able to effect the purchase of the 41,023 tsubo of land inside the Race Course. Particular thanks are due to Mr. Mori for the immense task of successfully bringing together the seventy-seven former owners which enabled the Club to acquire the property. The Club came into possession of the grounds on the 30th June and the construction of a Tan Training Track was immediately proceeded with, together with the formation of the many small fields into one large and well drained moor.

Pending the Registration of the Club as a Juridical Person, the property is registered in the name of Mr. K. Mori on behalf of the Club. Application for the registration of the Club has been filed with the authorities and a favourable reply is expected very shortly.

The new Articles of Association entail some alterations in the present constitution of the Club, and the Rules will require revision when the Registration has been completed.

It is recommended that the grounds be leased to Sporting Associations formed by Members, Full and Subscribing of the Race Club. That such Sporting Associations shall elect from amongst their members, a Committee to represent their interests and to whom the Race Club will look for the proper conduct of their Associations. The Committees of such Associations shall not include any members serving on the Permanent or Executive Committees of the Race Club. That Rights and Privileges, to be agreed upon, be granted to such Sporting Associations for considerations to be agreed on, it however, being clearly understood that should the interests of such Sporting Associations clash with those of the Race Club, the Association using the grounds of the Nippon Race Club shall be secondary and must in all cases give way to the interests of the Nippon Race Club.

As the accommodation in the Paddock Stand and Enclosure proved to be quite inadequate, the Executive, with the approval of the Permanent Committee, have arranged with Mr. Becker, Architect, to construct a new Stand which it is estimated will accommodate some 4,500 persons. Should this later on, prove to be too small, an extension of the new building will be possible without material alterations to present buildings. The present Paddock Stand is to be removed to the Carriage Paddock and will form an extension of the Grand Stand and Lawn. These additions and alterations are estimated to cost Yen Seventeen to Eighteen thousand.

The Committee's thanks are due to Mrs. Warming and the Ladies of Yokohama and Tokyo who so kindly provided a Purse for the Spring Meeting, also to those gentlemen who were good enough to assist in various official capacities.

32 Full and 13 Subscribing members have been added to the Club's list of members during the year. The total is now 196 Full and 98 Subscribing members.

It is with particular regret that the death has to be recorded of Baron Sannomiya, an old friend of the Club and one who had always taken much interest in our Race Meetings.

Several changes in the Executive have taken place during the year. Messrs. Blad, Hughes, Tegner and De Cuers resigned; our best thanks are tendered to these gentlemen for most efficient work done during their terms of office.

Finally the Committee desire to place on record their satisfaction with the work, the Secretary, Mr. Geo. Hood, has continued to do.

In accordance with Rule IV. the Committee now retire.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

MOSQUITO YACHT CLUB.

The tenth Annual General Meeting of this Club was held at the United Club on Wednesday evening at 5.45. Owing to the Race Club Meeting and other gatherings the attendance was rather small.

The Report and Accounts were read and adopted. Commodore Hall supplemented the Report by thanking the kind donor of the prizes presented during the season. He mentioned that the Club yacht, the Aborigine, was still adding much to the pleasure of members and the Annual Interport Races between the Club and the Kobe Sailing Club were much appreciated as stimulating interest in racing. The retiring officebearers and committee were re-elected in toto.

A CHRISTIAN MEMORIAL SERVICE.

A Christian Memorial Service for the 1300 Tokyo soldiers who fell in the late war, was held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Kanda, on Wednesday December 20th, at 2 p.m., under the auspices of the Japan Evangelical Alliance, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Japan Temperance League and the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Invitations were sent to all the families of these brave men, and a large attendance was anticipated. Marshal Oyama, Generals Kuroki and Kodama and many other officials and private citizens intimated their intention of being present.

While recounting the valorous deeds of these heroes, the purpose of the meeting was to administer words of comfort to their sorrowing relatives and to present each with some small memento of the occasion. In the midst of the universal rejoicings over the return of the victorious troops, it is impossible to keep wholly out of mind the many who do not return but whose bones are left to mingle with the dust of the Manchurian plains or become the prey of the denizens of the great deep. Though this dreadful war is at last happily at an end, and we look forward with hope and confidence to an era of peace and brotherhood let us not forget the multitudes of hearts and homes left desolate, and do what we can to show our appreciation of the great sacrifices they as well as their illustrious dead have made for the common good.

In connexion with plague measures the Metropolitan Police have issued regulations regarding the construction of warehouses and sheds. These will be put into force on February 1st.

A number of bombs exploded in the shop of T. Terasawa, a fire-works dealer in Honjo, Tokyo, on the evening of Dec. 14th, while the employees were packing them in a case. The result was that parts of the ceiling and roof were destroyed and two persons were injured.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Slight snow fell in Yokohama on Thursday afternoon.

The Kobe City Assembly decided on Dec. 17th to raise a loan of thirty-three thousand yen in order to repay the house-tax collected from foreigners.

The Viceroy of Nanking has ordered from the Kawasaki Shipbuilding Yard, Kobe, three river gunboats. The contract was concluded on Dec. 14th at Nanking.

On the night of Dec. 13th, a man armed with a revolver entered the house of a pawn-broker named D. Ishikawa, Uyenô-machi, Tokyo. The intruder stole yen 10.

Russian newspapers declare that Field Marshal Marquis Oyama is a Finn. When a child he was, they say, taken to Saghalien, whence he escaped in a Japanese fishing boat. They explain that Oyama, in Finnish means a swamp. It will be remembered that the Russians once declared that General Baron Kuroki was of Polish descent.

The Hochi has a telegram from Moji stating that a Russian journalist named A. Peteroff arrived there on Dec. 14 by the Andalusia from Vladivostok. The same day, he left by the noon train for Tokyo. His purpose, according to the Japanese correspondent, is to investigate the various conditions existing after the conclusion of the war and to ascertain personally the attitude of the Japanese newspapers as to the relations between the former belligerents. He says that General Linévitch is at a railway station near Harbin. The Hochi adds that the Russian journalist is being escorted by police.

It is reported by Japanese papers that negotiations by the Sanyo Railway Company with a leading British firm of Yokohama representing a London syndicate, for a loan of twenty million yen have been successfully concluded. The principal terms are that interest is at 4 per cent. and the price realized by the borrowers will be 94. It is also said that the Kyushu Railway Co. have had an offer from the same British firm for a proposed loan of ten million yen, interest at 4 per cent. and the price to be realized by the borrowers 95. The Kyushu Railway Co., however, are conducting negotiations with American capitalists.

No. 38-B, Kobe, was entirely destroyed by fire on Wednesday night. The building, which was occupied by the offices of the Pilots' Association, Messrs. Teverson, and Messrs. Varma & Co., and Mr. Leman, covered an area of 42 tsubo. The building was insured for yen 3,500 and the movables at yen 2,000 by the L'Union Fire Insurance Co. Ltd., and the Commercial Union Assurance Co. Ltd. It is supposed that the fire was caused either by the carelessness of two boys employed by Mr. Leman when extinguishing a hibachi upstairs after the office had been closed, or to cigarette or cigar ends thrown down in the telephone room, where about 4 or 5 kwamme of sample cotton were kept and many papers were piled.

A serious accident happened on Camp Hill, Yokohama, on Friday evening which might have had more grave consequences. Mrs. G. Syme Thomson, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Cossor, was being driven to the ball at the Yokohama United Club in a closed brougham when the horse broke from control and upset the vehicle. Mrs. Thomson received some nasty cuts from the broken glass, but Mrs. Cossor escaped unhurt. Meanwhile several jinrikisha, also bound Clubwards, were descending the hill and, not seeing the overturned carriage ran into it and so upset their occupants, among them being Mrs. J. Carey Hall, Mrs. A. J. McClure and Miss Kenderdine. Fortunately none of these ladies received more than a severe shaking and were able to proceed to the Club, but Mrs. Thomson had to return home to have her injuries attended to. It is a wonderful thing that more accidents do not occur at this particular spot.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CASUALTIES OF TWO GREAT WARS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your article in your issue of December 4, giving "The casualties" of the late war, your last sentence reads as follows: "Even if we assume that as many (Japanese soldiers) perished 'from disease as those that fell in the fight, the grand total would not exceed 90,000, a figure less by nearly 40,000 than the German losses in the war of 1871.'"

It is not necessary for Germans to point out your various fallacies made from time to time on German affairs, but since the number of the German losses of 1870-71 has often been misstated, I take the liberty of now giving you the Correct and Official German Statistics, placing the numbers therein beside the Japanese numbers in your statement, as follows:

CASUALTIES FROM FIGHTING.

	Japanese	German
Killed in action or died of wounds	43,219	28,288
Wounded in action	153,673	88,488
Missing	5,681	12,944
Injured (not in action)	16,456	?
Total	218,429	129,700

CASUALTIES FROM DISEASE.

Sick (ordinary diseases)	203,270	?
Sick (contagious diseases)	17,866	?
Total	221,136	?

Died from disease	?	12,475
Grand total Casualties	439,565	?
Deaths	?	40,743

Sent from the field to hospitals in Japan	281,587

Recovered and resumed their places in the ranks	60,000

The number of German soldiers and officials present in France at the end of the war was one million, surely not less than the number of Japanese sent across the ocean during the whole war, so that the German losses were in every respect less than those of the Japanese.

It is to be remarked that no mention whatever is made in the Japanese grand total of 221,136, sick soldiers who died during or subsequently to the war, whereas the grand total of deaths during and in consequence of the Franco-German war is included in the number 40,743.

I remain, Yours, etc.

DR. MENGE.

Tokio, December 13, 1905.

RIJI AND TRUSTEE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I must admit that I used the word "Trustees" in the sense in which it is familiar in the United States as a name of the highest governing board of a University or College, and I quite agree that Riji is not an equivalent for "Trustees" in the other and more common meaning of that word. Many translate Riji as "Directors," but to most of us Americans "Trustees" is the more natural rendering for the Riji of an educational institution such as the Doshisha. I think I am right in saying that the use of Riji in this case, however it may be rendered in English, is entirely correct, and is not some idiosyncrasy of "certain Christians" and "open to serious objection." For the rest, it was no thought of finding fault with the translator, who of course could not know whether the word was singular or plural, that I explained what the fact was in this case.

I am, sir, etc.

CHINESE IDEOGRAPHS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The study of the Chinese ideograph is such an interesting theme, such an important theme, and one in regard to which our collective wisdom and experience make such a small total, that I am sure I will not be judged harshly if I add a word of my own experience and views to what has already appeared on the subject in the Japan Mail.

After three or four years teaching English in a Japanese school, followed by two years study in the United States, I returned to Japan and began the study of the language. At that time I did not hesitate to say that it was a sin for a missionary to spend valuable time acquiring a knowledge of the Chinese character. It did not take me many years to recognize that it was a sin for him not to do so. I heartily endorse all that is said on the importance of this study in the excellent preface of Chamberlain's "Mojin Shiryô." Whatever may have been the case years ago, and whatever may be the case a decade or a score of years hence, to-day, after a certain stage of acquaintance with the Japanese language has been attained, the way forward lies along a path paved with Chinese characters, and the man who does not elect to follow that path, does not, except in the rarest of cases, advance. There are no doubt cases of missionaries who have done a deal of good with a limited knowledge of the colloquial, but no properly ambitious young man coming to this land with the lofty purpose of spending his life endeavoring to make the rapidly advancing men and women of Japan know of the new life in Jesus Christ, will be satisfied with anything short of knowing what the bulk of the Japanese know, being able to read, and being able to express himself intelligently about things that interest them. This implies an acquaintance with the Chinese character. He may never attain his ideal, but he will ever maintain it, and the very maintaining and pursuing it will tend to make him raise rather than lower it.

But to speak of the acquisition of the character,—the writer notes a tendency to-day for students to begin the study of the Chinese character too early in their careers. This he regards as a serious mistake, making too great demands on nervous energy, and calling for double the effort which the acquisition of the same characters at a later period would call for. Surely it is task enough to fix 馬 in the memory after you have thoroughly absorbed 和 and 和, without trying to fix the character while these words are still, so to speak, afloat. I would not have a student begin to do serious work at the Chinese character till he has a full two years' acquaintance with the language acquired through 和 and 和. Of course I would not have a man walk around a simple character lying in his path, but I would not have him expend effort on it as an end.

It is of course, not an insuperable thing to memorize very early in one's career a few hundred characters, especially with a good system; but it is another story to make them stick. Any number of young students will tell you of a time when they could recognize 400, or 800, or 1200 or 2000 characters, only to have them slip from the mind completely when left unreviewed a few weeks or months. The truth is that a Chinese character will not stay in the mind till you have a place to put it, till you are master of what it stands for. So, it is when a man has a fair knowledge of the colloquial that he can best begin, and he will find it a constant delight to learn the character for words of which he has been master for a year or more.

No one could fail to note in the very informing article on this subject by "A Missionary," that his soul-satisfying success at character study came when after a dozen or fifteen years of hard study and constant practice he had made himself exceptionally well acquainted with the Japanese language. I would not have my student wait a dozen or fifteen years, but I would have him wait till he knows well a Japanese horse and a Chinese horse before he attempts to paint their ideographic picture.

Again, I would hold up the ideal of mastering the character. It is not enough to be able to recognize it; one ought to be able to make the mental picture of the character upon hearing its on or kun spoken. If he can do this, he can, of course, write it. One may be able to recognize the character months or years before he can reproduce it at will, but that ought to be his ideal. Analysis is the method. It is a great day when a man can lay off almost any character into radical and primitive, but it is a happier day when he can break up his primitives into their component parts and hold them in mind in that way. For some of these component parts he may have only fantastic names, or no name at all, but he knows them as units, his primitive is made up of these, and this in turn unites with several different radicals; and the knowledge of one character thus becomes a key to the knowledge of many others.

The writer made a sparing use of cards, and no use of card boxes. He recognizes that "A Missionary's" method of concentrating attack on the unknown and doubtful characters is absolutely sure to bring down the game, and is perhaps the quickest method besides. But acquiring single characters written on a card, as compared with acquiring characters linked naturally in compounds, seems like facing a door-jamb and monotonously pulling a Whitley Exerciser, as compared with digging and scratching in a flower garden. It is too dry and uninteresting. Besides that, how many Chinese characters are to be found alone in splendid isolation? Memorizing a character in that style calls for too much main strength and awkwardness. A merciful Providence has given us almost every Chinese character bolstered up by another in a compound, a natural mnemonic help. The one way is like making one of these character cards stand up on edge, difficult even with a mnemonic bend in it, the other like bracing two of them one against the other.

I do not think the study of the character is discouraging or exhausting if one has a proper foundation for it. Of course there will be weeks when one will shoot ahead rapidly, and again weeks of the slowest progress. Characters will slip from the mind. No man can hold for a long time characters he is not constantly using; but with a fixed purpose and a certain amount of constant effort and continuous use, one's knowledge will surely grow. And while at first one's ideal may have been fixed at reading a plainly printed page, the chances are that it will move up to reading a plainly written letter, then a rather poorly written one; nor is one apt to be content till he can write simple messages in a letter or on a postal card. The writer does not claim to have attained all this. He is simply one of those that press on; but he is glad to say that the more he presses, the more he wishes to press forward.

In conclusion I would like to speak of a book that has been to me more than ordinarily helpful. It bears the ridiculous title of "Japanese Conversation in Six Months." The book was reviewed rather severely in the Japan Mail some months ago. After such a title it is rather a surprise to find a large amount of genuine good sense in the preface. The body of the book is headed "Japanese Conversational Vocabulary of Chinese Words." This is just what the book is, and it might well have served for the title. Some three hundred common and indispensable characters are chosen, and under each are given from five to fifteen compounds in which it occurs. These are almost without exception words in common use. The print is clear, the arrangement convenient, the book portable, and it is to be had of Kelly and Walsh for two yen. This makes an excellent utile mecum for train, jinrikisha, basha or study. The arrangement is most convenient for learning first to recognize, and later to mentally picture, the three hundred characters, and from that on to about 2700 compounds. These, thoroughly mastered, will make a valuable addition to any man's store; and the writer is of the opinion that to a large number of students this vocabulary is the logical next step. Sincerely,
Saga, Dec. 12th, 1905. "SOJOURNER."

The stories of a violent collision between the Kaiser and King Edward were idiotic lies. EXPORTS.
RAW SILK.

There has been a fair amount of buying during the week, principally for direct export. We leave quotations unchanged. Slight concessions have been made in a few instances but at closing holders have again put on an appearance of strength and talk about higher prices once more. Whether they will be able to carry this out or not remains to be seen. The stock in Yokohama is heavy and further supplies are reported near at hand. Meantime offers come in from consuming markets at prices below our quotations and these are not at present practicable.

Neither his nor the Chief Officer's certificate was dealt with, and both were commended, together with the crew, for their conduct in the casualty occurred.

THE PEKING CONFERENCE.

Saturday, December 23.

The news is reported that the results of the Peking negotiation are much as has been already stated. In the Asahi's telegraphic correspondence we read that the forests along the Yalu are to be exploited by Japanese and Chinese in combination, a provision not mentioned hitherto. It is further alleged that whatever be the nominal results of the Treaty, the practical gains accruing to Japan are very large. The Antung-Mukden railway appears to be designated a "military line," which would indicate that the present railway, laid by the Japanese troops, is not to be enlarged into an ordinary road. As for the Hsinmintun-Mukden and the Kirin-Changchun lines, they are to be built by Chinese and Japanese in combination. This last arrangement had been anticipated and was spoken of some time ago in these columns as highly probable. China has learned what is involved in railway concessions to foreigners. She would be remarkably dense of perception if she had not learned it, and we need not designate her principal teachers. The mood of the nation at present, a mood of exceptional depth and universality, is to withhold all such concessions for the future and even to recover those already made. Therefore it was hardly to be expected that extensive concessions of that nature would be made to Japan in Manchuria—Manchuria which has been the school where China's bitterest lessons were learned. On the other hand, the gratitude due to Japan constituted an element of strong moral pressure, and the strategical need of the lines proposed by the Japanese could not be gainsaid. In these circumstances the evident solution lay in the direction of Chinese and Japanese combination, and apparently that solution has been adopted.

It is stated that post-offices and telegraph stations established throughout Manchuria by the Japanese are to be preserved.

There is a conflict of assertions as to the number of new ports to be opened in Manchuria. The original news said "over ten." Now comes intelligence speaking of 17, and yet again of 19.

It appears that the original intention was to sign the treaty on the 21st instant, but the Chinese found that day inauspicious, and therefore the ceremony was postponed until the 22nd.

Baron Komura and his suite appear to have been received with extraordinary courtesy at the Summer Palace on the 21st instant.

Sunday, December 24.

The Fiji Shimpō's Peking correspondent telegraphs that although the contents of the newly signed treaty will not be definitely known until after the exchange of ratifications, a tolerably clear idea may be gathered by collating the various items of information which have thus far leaked out. It is plain that Japan has succeeded to all the rights and privileges previously possessed by Russia. She gets the reversion of the Liaotung lease, the railway south of Changchun with all its branches and its collateral mining or other concessions. Further, in addition to Mukden, Antung and Ying-kau, she obtains a promise that as soon as possible after the withdrawal of the Japanese and Russian troops, China will open Manchuria, Hailar, Tsitsihar, Harbin, Hulan, Petova, Sansin, Changchun, Kaiyuan, Kirin, Tieling, Liaoyang, Hsinmintun and Fakumun—14 new places. (If the words "as soon as possible" are used, it is not beyond the range of reasonable expectation that China may delay as long as she did over the opening of the upper reaches of the Yangtze.—En. J. M.) Moreover a new agreement has been formed as to overland trade between Manchuria and Korea, and Japan is to participate on equal terms in the privileges secured by the Russo-Chinese convention about that trade. Again, the exploitation of the forests in the Yalu Valley (presumably those on the Manchurian side of the river) is to be undertaken by Chinese and Japanese in combination. The military posts and telegraphs established by Japan in Manchuria are to continue under her supervision even in time of peace. The railway from Wiju to Mukden is to belong to Japan, but the railway from Hsinmintun to Mukden will be bought by China, and the line from Changchun to Kirin will be built by China with Chinese and Japanese capital after the manner of the Shanhaikwan railway. Japan is to have special settlements in Mukden, Antung and Yingkow. China further agrees that the rivers Yalu, Sungari and Liao shall be open to foreign navigation on the same footing and in the same manner as is decided by the regulations for the navigation of her inland waters. The Japanese Railway Guards will be withdrawn so soon as Russia agrees to withdraw hers, but as to shortening the period of evacuation by the armies of the two Powers, China has given up her demand. Japan, on the other hand abandons her conditions with regard to coastwise fisheries and salt-manufacture as well as with regard to the exportation of cereals from Manchuria?

This list does not profess to be altogether exhaustive but it is believed to contain all the principal provisions.

As to the purchase of the railway from Hsinmintun to Mukden by China, the explanation is that a military line has already been constructed between the two places by Russia, which line is now in Japanese possession. China will acquire it by purchase and will convert it into a permanent road. Concerning the Kirin-Changchun line, the Fiji says that the facts are not even so satisfactory as the above brief outline suggests. For China is not only to build the line herself, but also her application to Japan for capital need not be made unless she finds herself unable to furnish the capital out of her own pocket, and under any circumstances is not to exceed one half of the total amount.

The Fiji Shimpō, writing editorially, is profoundly disappointed with this convention. It declares that the Chinese know neither gratitude nor right, and that the Japanese Government has supplemented the Portsmouth blunder by another error which completes the category.

It is now stated that Baron Komura will shorten his projected trip en route for home and will reach Tokyo about the 2nd of January.

Monday, December 25.

Although the details of the new Manchurian Convention remain concealed, it is alleged (Kokumin Shinbun's correspondence) that a belief prevails among the Chinese public that no excessive or unjustifiable demands were made by Japan and that the negotiations were conducted in the most amicable manner. Baron Komura is said to have won golden opinions not only by his manner of conducting the negotiations but also by his courtesy and earnestness, irrespective of his illness. The Foreign Ministers, on the other hand, are represented as believing that some secret understanding or convention exists between China and Japan, and they are much exercised as to the details. Baron Komura, on the eve of his departure, appears to have showed the same generosity that marked his conduct at Portsmouth by making munificent donations to the Japan Society and to private Chinese educational institutions. Great preparations were made for giving His Excellency a worthy send off. He left Peking on the 24th at 2 p.m. and was accompanied even as far as Tientsin by a number of his own nationals as well as Chinese subjects. The Peking Government sent a guard of honour to escort him from the Legation to the station, and at the latter some 200 persons of the highest rank, including all the foreign chefs de Mission, assembled to bid him farewell.

The Asahi's correspondent, supported by the correspondents of other journals, wires that the main counts of the Japanese proposals were 11 and that there were 6 supplementary articles making 17 in all, while the Chinese, on their side, presented 7 proposals, and thus the total number to be discussed numbered 24. Therefore the fact that twenty conferences were needed to dispose of the whole can not be deemed extraordinary. All the Tokyo journals, except the Fiji Shimpō, now publish statements from their correspondents in the sense that the Treaty is satisfactory, that Japan has obtained in full the privileges which she sought and that China also has been satisfied.

The exchange of ratifications is expected to take place in Peking and there is no anticipation of any delay such as marked the procedure in the case of the Portsmouth Treaty.

The British public (Nichi Nichi Shimbun's London correspondent) are much pleased by the news that 17 places in Manchuria are to be opened to foreign trade. This arrangement is described by The Times as a measure which proves the correctness of Japan's position after the war. The Berlin newspapers also express much approval of Japan's moderation and liberality.

Tuesday, December 26.

There seems to be some doubt about the number and names of the places in Manchuria which are to be opened under the conditions of the new treaty. We now hear of Tungkiang-tsz, Chang-tu, Ninguta, Aikun, Itung-chau and Fangchun being included, but the accounts differ so much that it is impossible to speak with any confidence. Rumour is busy about the treaty itself also. The document is said to be short and in several respects unsatisfactory, but there is a supplementary convention embodying conditions which materially change the nature of China's concessions.

Baron Komura was received by a large number of Chinese and Japanese at the Tientsin station on his arrival there. There was a guard of honour consisting of two companies of Japanese infantry, and the road was kept by a hundred Chinese police. In the evening the Japan Club entertained the Plenipotentiaries. Mr. Ijima, Consul-General, speaking on behalf of the Japanese community, said that they believed that the result of the Peking negotiations had been to create further opportunities for Japan's development and they thanked the Plenipotentiaries accordingly. Baron Komura, in replying, observed that the issue of the war had greatly raised Japan's international status and had correspondingly increased her responsibilities. He urged the importance of close friendship between Japan and China. Mr. Uchida also spoke. He alluded to the fact that for the first time in the history of China's international relations the Emperor had shaken hands with a foreign Plenipotentiary. He also said that whereas the absence of secrecy and good faith (seigi) had been habitually a subject of complaint against China, her behaviour in connexion with these negotiations had shown that it depended on her vis-à-vis whether she displayed or did not display these qualities.

On the 27th instant Baron Komura and his suite embarked at Chingwan-tao on the Manshu Maru. It is now said that no call will be made at Korea and that the steamer will proceed direct to Japan, reaching Yokohama on the 1st prox.

Wednesday, December 27.

According to the Kokumin Shimbun the places that will be opened to foreign trade and residence in Manchuria after the new treaty comes into operation are as follow:

PROVINCE OF SHINGKING.

Fenghuang-ching, Liaoyang, Hsinmintun, Tieling, Tungkiangtz, Changtu and Fakumun—7 in all.

PROVINCE OF KIRIN.

Changchun, Kirin, Harbin, Hangchun and Sansin—5 in all.

PROVINCE OF AMUR.

Teitihar, Hailar, Aikun and Manjuria—4 in all.

This makes the number to be 16, and it may be taken for granted that the Kokumin's version is correct.

Baron Komura, according to the Asahi's correspondent, has stated to the Japanese advisers of the Pehchili local government that parts of the new agreement will be duly made known, but that it may be considered expedient to keep other parts permanently secret, in which case the public will have to infer them from facts.

The Hochi Shimbun insists that the Treaty is a conspicuous failure and that it consists of only three articles which briefly recognise Japan's position in the Liaotung Peninsula and her title to the railway and its branches south of Changchun. This newspaper is evidently disposed to create the worst possible impression of the results obtained by the Japanese Plenipotentiaries. The Jiji, however, joins its voice to this verdict. It makes the point that if there be any real necessity for preserving secrecy with regard to certain portions of the Agreement, then to allude to their existence at all is not permissible. "Good wine needs no bush." If the arrangement made in Peking were really laudable, these attempts to invest it with an air of mystery would be superfluous. Another point made by the Jiji is, it must be confessed, somewhat of the nature of special pleading. Our contemporary calls attention to the fact that the Plenipotentiaries claim to have secured everything obtained by the Portsmouth Treaty but they avoid using the term "Portsmouth Conference." Japan obtained at the Conference more than she obtained by the Treaty itself. In the minutes of the proceedings or in diplomatic notes she obtained from Russia the concession of both the Kirin-Changchun and the Hsinmintun-Mukden lines, but at the Peking Conference she has not obtained concessions for either. We may note en passant that this criticism seems scarcely just. Russia had not received from China any concession for building a line from Kirin to Changchun, and therefore, so far as that line was concerned, she could not do more than signify her acquiescence in any step Japan might take to secure a concession from China.

Again, in the case of the Mukden-Hsinmintun line, Russia had no concession to surrender. She had actually laid a military line which was then in Japan's possession, but she could not give any title for the conversion of this line into a permanent way. Such a title had to be sought from China just as a similar title had to be sought with regard to the military line built by Japan between Antung and Mukden. The Jiji has more to say but the backbone of its criticism is that this talk of a secret understanding—talk which is in itself improper, inconsistent with the principle of real secrecy and calculated to provoke the suspicions of other Powers—must be regarded as a mere sop to Cerberus; a device to blind men's eyes to what is in truth a signal failure.

THE DIET.

The Diet met on the 25th instant and took the usual steps for organizing the Houses. The official opening will be on the 28th or the 30th instant, when of course the Diet will rise at once for the New Year's recess.

We may here mention that the number of members in the House of Peers is now 360, and that in the House of Representatives is 378 (the latter being one short of the fixed complement).

His Majesty's Speech at the opening of the Diet on the 28th instant was as follows:

"We hereby perform the ceremony of opening the Imperial Diet, and address the members of the Two Houses:—

By the assistance of our officials, civil and military, and of the members of the Diet, and by the loyalty of Our people We have concluded an honorable peace and have resumed friendly relations with Our neighbour, Russia. We have also renewed Our Alliance with England, and to Our profound satisfaction Our relations with the Treaty Powers grow constantly more intimate.

Various Conventions between Our Empire and Korea have had the effect of drawing the two countries closer together, and it is necessary that measures should henceforth be taken to make this amity warmer, thereby leading Korea fully into the path of progress and enlightenment.

We have instructed Our Ministers to submit to the Diet the Budget for the 39th fiscal year of Meiji together with certain projects of law, and We trust that You will accomplish Our purpose by bringing to the discharge of your legislative duties a spirit of concord and co-operation with due regard to the interests of the nation and for the sake of its future welfare."

The above speech was delivered at 11 a.m. His Majesty, accompanied by Marquis Tokudaiji, the Chief Chamberlain, had left the Palace at 10.30 a.m., reaching the House of Peers ten minutes later and proceeding to the Throne dais after a brief interval. The speech, after delivery, was handed to Prince Tokugawa, President of the House of Peers, and the Sovereign set out for the Palace at twelve minutes past eleven.

At 11.43 the House of Representatives met and appointed a Committee to draft a reply to the Speech from the Throne as well as an Address of Congratulation. The Reply ran as follows:—

"Your Majesty's servant, Matsuda Masahisa, President of the House of Representatives, reverently addressing Your Majesty on behalf of the House, is profoundly moved by Your Majesty's condescension in visiting the House, performing the ceremony of opening for the twenty-second time, and vouchsafing to us a gracious message. The responsibilities of the Empire are heavier than ever now that the war has been concluded, and Your Majesty's servants, bringing to the discharge of their legislative duties the utmost circumspection and sincerity, will seek to respond to Your Majesty's wishes and to justify the trust reposed in them by the people."

The following is a translation of the Address of Congratulation, which, in the procedure of the House, took the form of a Representation:—

Your Majesty's servant, Matsuda Masahisa, President of the House of Representatives, has the honour to state with the utmost reverence and humility:—Since Your Majesty, endowed with profound sagacity, ascended the Throne, Your Majesty has adopted and pursued a great policy, encouraging literature, honouring the pursuit of arms, organizing the administration, improving the government, cementing friendship with foreign countries, forming an Alliance with England and taking Korea under the Empire's protection, thus renewing the glory of the Empire and ruling it with wise discrimination for which no parallel is to be found in ancient or modern times. Unfortunately hostilities had to be opened last year with Russia, and in accordance with the Imperial Declaration of War Your Majesty's forces taking the field, the stout soldiers and sailors of the Empire showed its might far and near, and never failed, whether on sea or shore to achieve signal victories. Then, no sooner did a friendly Power intervene than Your Majesty responded with the utmost magnanimity, and concluded peace, so that the Empire's armies are now returning amid triumphant acclamations. We, Your Majesty's servants, owe it to Your Majesty's virtues that these unprecedented results have been achieved and that we living in an age when our country's fame is noised abroad, are privileged to witness these illustrious deeds and to assist in a great national programme. No fortune can be happier."

The House then rose until the 20th of January.

THE RUSSIAN TROOPS.

A Russian cavalry officer who served under Rennenkampf, has just reached Moji en route for home, having been allowed to find his own way to Russia. He says that Linevitch and Kuropatkin are sparing no effort to effect the withdrawal of the forces under their command, but the incapacity of a single line of railway is making itself severely felt, and there is now very little hope of accomplishing the evacuation within the period fixed by treaty. Hitherto only the staff of the Fourth Army—that under Zabeiff—has been transported. This is very explicit but we find it difficult to reconcile with the fact that all these troops were carried from Russia by the same railway within a period of 20 months. Evidently if 20 months sufficed to bring them out, 18 should be ample to take them home, seeing the equipment of forces going to the field must of necessity be much larger than that of troops quitting the campaign.

It is related that the Hungtutz, moving from the direction of Petan, essayed a strong coup against Harbin, but they were encountered by a force of Cossacks and completely shattered, having about 300 men killed and wounded.

There is also a report, said to be current in Vladivostok, that the Saghalien refugees, now collected in Habarovsk, have made common cause with the revolutionary party there, and are contemplating a raid upon the island so soon as the ice breaks up. A great deal may happen before the ice breaks up, however. This is not the only indication of unrest in Siberia. Reports from other quarters also suggest that the revolutionary spirit, hitherto supposed to be confined to places along the railway, has spread into the interior. Thus the inhabitants of the Timur (?) peninsula are contemplating the establishment of a republic.

THE Osaka Shosen Kaisha's new steamer Kaijo Maru, which was recently launched at the Kawasaki Shipbuilding Yard, Kobe, underwent a successful trial on Dec. 25th off Nishinomiya. She will be employed on the service between the Korean coast and Kobe. Her gross tonnage is 2,100 tons.

THE SHANGHAI RIOTS.

Saturday, December 23.

The Viceroy at Nanking having received orders from the Throne to proceed at once to Shanghai for the purpose of taking whatever steps may be necessary in connexion with the recent disturbance, is reported to have gone thither. It appears that the Mixed Court was re-opened on the 21st instant and that the Volunteers were disbanded on the 20th, though the marines landed by the war-ships still patrol the streets. A report, carried by a steamer which left Shanghai apparently on the 19th, says that one American woman and over 10 Chinese subjects were killed, and that the wounded numbered more than 30.

Some fears are entertained, it is said, that these events may prelude another rising of the Boxers, and a question has consequently been raised whether the time is opportune for the proposed withdrawal of the foreign troops from the metropolitan province. The Waiwupu is represented as attributing the origin of the trouble solely to the anti-Chinese legislation of the United States, and to be maintaining a very firm attitude on the subject. At all events the indications go to prove that the Chinese nation is awakening to a new view of its foreign relations.

It is reported that in some circles in Shanghai the Japanese residents are suspected of complicity in the riot. Such a statement has been definitely made by the China Gazette, a notoriously anti-Japanese journal, and even the correspondent of The Times seems to have telegraphed to that journal that Japanese subjects were seen taking part in the disturbance. The Japanese Consul-General has officially denied these statements, and has challenged any person to adduce proofs. We apprehend that the challenge will remain unanswered. That fine quality of truth which we Occidentals are so prone to find wanting in the moral make-up of Orientals, does not usually shine on our own side in crises like the present. On the other hand some onlooker may really have imagined that he identified Japanese subjects among the rioters. Such mistakes may easily occur under the confusing circumstances of a street broil. Neither is it impossible that two or three Japanese loafers, willing to take part in any commotion, are to be found in Shanghai, just as there are to be found at most of the open ports European or American loafers capable of utilizing any opportunity. But no one at all acquainted with the Japanese will readily suspect them of deliberate complicity in any lawless demonstration directed against foreign life and property in Shanghai.

The Jiji Shimpō writes in a serious tone about the state of public opinion in China. It apprehends the growth of an anti-foreign spirit which may lead to great trouble, and it declares that Japan must not shrink from any duty or decline any responsibility in connexion with averting such a danger to the peace of the East.

Things appear to have quieted down in Shanghai. The Viceroy has arrived there from Nanking and it was expected that the Mixed Court would be opened on the 22nd instant. On the night of the 21st a half-hearted attempt was made to injure the Water-works, but it was easily frustrated. The most important of those injured in the disturbance were the Vice-Consuls of Germany, the United States and England, but none of them was badly hurt. It would seem that the naval patrols are still on duty. Their number has been augmented by 120 men from the Japanese cruiser Tsushima.

It is stated that the conduct of the Japanese marines who were landed at Shanghai received universal applause, especially from the female section of the population, and no credit is placed any longer in the story that Japanese subjects sided with the rioters. Order has been restored, but it is thought that an exceptionally dull state of commercial affairs will mark the Christmas and New Year season.

Tuesday, December 26.

The Waiwupu is said to have addressed to the British Representative in Peking three demands in connexion with the affairs of the Mixed Court in Shanghai. The first is that the present British Consul who was sitting as assessor when the trouble occurred should be transferred to some other post. The second is that the policemen who resorted to acts of violence should be punished, and the third is that henceforth Chinese subjects, when apprehended by the police, should be detained solely in the Chinese jail, and, in short, that everything relating to jurisdiction over them should be in China's hands.

There was some expectation of another outbreak in Shanghai on the night of the 25th, but as yet (morning of the 26th) no intelligence has been received showing whether it took place or did not. All possible precautions had been taken to check any display of lawlessness, so the probability is that things passed off quietly.

The French newspaper of Shanghai publishes a telegram from London saying that the correspondent of The Times in Shanghai has telegraphed to that paper in the sense that some connexion existed between the Chinese rioters and the Japanese residents; that a section of the latter were on friendly terms with the rioters; that the rioters avoided injuring Japanese persons or property in any way; and that the Government in Tokyo should take steps to impress upon the Chinese Government the necessity of checking the growth of an anti-foreign feeling in Shanghai. With reference to this the Shanghai correspondent of the Jiji Shimpō wires that he called on The Times correspondent and received from the latter an acknowledgement of having sent the above telegram. In proof of his assertions The Times correspondent alleged that when an employee of the Municipal Council was attacked by the Chinese rioters in the vicinity of the police-station, he (the correspondent) observed several persons, whom he took to be Japanese, standing by and smiling but making no attempt to succour the assailed man. Also he had seen a Japanese among the mob that stoned the home of the Municipality's Engineer. Asked by the Jiji's correspondent whether he had distinctly identified as Japanese subjects the persons referred to, The Times correspondent had been unable to reply. It is further alleged by the Jiji's correspondent that not the slightest truth exists in the allegation of Japanese subjects' complicity, and that The Times correspondent seems to be endeavouring to avoid the blame of having sent such a telegram. He also denies that the affair of the Mixed Court has anything to do with the question of extrajudicial jurisdiction. The whole matter turns on whether the Regulations of the Court are to be strictly enforced or not. The Chinese ask simply for their strict enforcement. It is expected that the committee of the Japanese Association in Shanghai will take steps to contradict the report sent to London by the correspondent of The Times.

We re-produce these statements as they appear in the Jiji Shimpō's telegrams, but of course we are not in a position to say more than that the Japanese in Tokyo seem to be wholly sceptical about the participation of their fellow-subjects in the riots. Concerning the responsibility of Japan to check the growth of an anti-foreign feeling in China, we really fail to see that any such duty specially devolves on her except as a matter of self-interest. She has exceptional reasons for averting any serious trouble between China and foreign nations, since her proximity to the scene would be likely to involve herself more or less, and she is pledged in common with England to preserve the open door in the Middle Kingdom. It may therefore be taken for granted that she will spare no effort to prevent complications constituting a menace to her own tranquillity or to the policy she has openly adopted. But beyond that we fail to see what special responsibility devolves on her. It is notorious—we may remark en passant—that the modern Chinese students, especially those who have been educated in Japan, have cut off their queues and adopted foreign costume, and it is patent to every observer that such students, if mixed among a crowd of their own nationals at night, would be scarcely, if at all, distinguishable from Japanese. Possibly The Times' correspondent was misled by this resemblance.

We have received from a correspondent a letter (not for publication) querying the correctness of comments made in one of our recent issues with reference to the case at the Mixed Court in Shanghai. Our correspondent's impression, a very natural impression, is that since the accused persons were apprehended in the first instance by the Municipal Police and were arraigned by the latter, therefore the duty of holding them, pending final trial should have devolved on these same police; whereas our view was that the question as between detention by the Municipal Police and detention by the Chinese Authorities was mainly one of humanity. It must be clearly understood at the outset that the foreign Consular officials who sit as assessors in the Mixed Court have no juridical competence. They can not pass sentences or enforce them if passed. Foreigners do not appear before this Court unless they have no legally established foreign nationality in which event they rank with Chinese subjects for judicial purposes. The Court is essentially a tribunal for trying Chinese subjects who have offended against the law. It has no jurisdiction over foreigners, and similarly the Foreign Assessor present in the Court has no jurisdiction over Chinese subjects arraigned before it. When this is understood it will easily be perceived that though the Municipal Police—a body of men organized by the foreign community, maintained and controlled by the latter and comprising some foreigners in its ranks—when the Municipal police have arrested a Chinese malefactor within the foreign Settlement and have arraigned him before the Mixed Court, everything relating to the subsequent conduct of the case passes under the control of the Court, the foreign assessor's functions being limited to watching that nothing injurious to foreigners' conventional interests takes place. In short, whatever competence the Municipal Police possess in the preliminary stages, ceases so soon as the case passes under the jurisdiction of the Court. The necessity of this distinction was well illustrated in this very instance, for after the chief prisoner had been forcibly removed to the Municipal prison, the Chinese Authorities received evidence establishing her innocence but were nevertheless unable to release her since they did not have her in custody. Thus much premised we may pass to a letter written by Mr. F. Anderson, Chairman of the Municipal Council, to the Senior Consul. After noticing the receipt of an intimation from the Consular Body that the woman was declared innocent and should be at once released, Mr. Anderson goes on to say:—

The reasons for which the Consular Body originally decided that female prisoners should be placed in the new women's ward have been fully recorded in the past, but the Council would take this opportunity of again drawing attention to the facts published in last year's Annual Report as to the condition of the cells in which women were formerly detained at the Mixed Court and to that of the 14th October, recently submitted to yourself.

The Consular Body's decision to introduce necessary reforms in the management of the women's ward, a decision based on civilised usage and fully justified by local conditions, was conveyed to the Chinese authorities in the Senior Consul's dispatch of the 10th June; if this decision is now to be reversed it is to be hoped that at least arrangements will be made with the Chinese authorities for suitable supervision of the native gaol's administration.

It will be observed from these paragraphs that the Municipal Authorities so far from asserting any right to hold in custody Chinese subjects apprehended by the Municipal Police, admit by implication that they have no such right, and that the question is simply one of humane procedure. They state distinctly that women were formerly detained at the Mixed Court, and that, last year, the condition of the cells there attracted attention which resulted in reformed arrangements, namely (as Consul-General Knappe's letter to the Taotai shows) the preparation of a proper ward for females in the Municipal jail. It seems to have been owing to an attempt to utilize this new ward that the friction occurred between the Mixed Court Authorities and the Municipal Police. Naturally all our sympathies are with the Municipal Authorities who are thus endeavouring, so far as in them lies, to correct in Shanghai at all events the flagrant abuses of Chinese judicial procedure. It is bad enough that foreign Consuls should be constructively consenting parties to the methods of a Court where the bamboo and the cage are used as they are in the Mixed Court of Shanghai. If that can not be mended, the light of modern civilization may at least be let into the shocking prisons to which the Chinese Magistrates of the Mixed Court in Shanghai commit, or used to commit, the innocent and the guilty alike. This particular incident, being unfortunately associated with violence which has carried it out of the realm of calm discussion, is scarcely a fitting occasion for diplomatic interference. But there can be no question that the Foreign Representatives in Peking should spare no effort to place the Mixed Court system on a more intelligent basis.

Wednesday, December 27.

The Japanese Association at Shanghai have held a meeting and have addressed to The Times a very strongly worded telegram with reference to the message sent to that journal by its Shanghai correspondent. The Association's telegram states that after full investigation it has been ascertained that no grounds whatever exist for the correspondent's message as to Japanese subjects having taken part in the riot or as to their having afforded facilities to the rioters.

The Association concludes by publicly protesting in the strongest terms against such a hasty and unwarranted message as that sent by The Times' correspondent.

We gather from subsequent telegrams that The Times' correspondent did not assert the responsibility of the Japanese Government taking steps to check the anti-foreign feeling that is growing in China. He went a great deal further, for he alleged that the Japanese Government must share with the Chinese Government the responsibility for the riot. Such, at least, seems to be the version of his message as re-telegraphed from London to the French journal in Shanghai. But it will be wise to refrain from placing implicit credence in this version. We find it almost impossible to believe that such an expression of opinion would have been telegraphed by the correspondent, who is a man of long experience in the East and of established reputation. What seems probable is that he mistook for Japanese subjects Chinamen who were without queues and who wore foreign costume. It would seem, too, that the correspondent subsequently sent telegrams modifying or softening his original statement. In these later messages he said that the majority of the Japanese were opposed to the growth of the anti-foreign feeling but that it is unavoidable that some of the young men who have been making trouble in Korea should find their way to China also; and he further said that the Japanese Consul denied the complicity of a single Japanese subject with the riots. These messages are of a modifying nature no doubt, but we take leave to doubt the accuracy of the wires, for the former of the two messages makes the correspondent allege by implication that the young Japanese who have been making trouble for the Government in Korea and their congeners in Japan are advocates of an anti-foreign policy. It is incredible that he can have fallen into that error.

The Jiji Shimpō does not believe that The Times' correspondent was actuated by any deliberate desire to injure Japanese reputation, but it professes unbounded astonishment that he should have allowed himself to be thus misled. It would appear that he lightly placed credence in stories told him by untrustworthy observers. To be misinformed or mistaken is a very venial offence, but not to exercise intelligent discrimination is to show oneself unworthy of such a trust as is reposed in the correspondence of the leading journal of the world. The Jiji speaks of Mr. Morrison, The Times' Peking correspondent, as a man who would never have been betrayed into such a misconception when telegraphing about events in China, and expresses a hope that The Times will guard itself against a repetition of such errors.

We do not at all wonder at the indignation and astonishment caused in Tokyo by this incident, but it will be prudent to wait until the exact text of the criticized telegram is forthcoming before attempting to pass judgment.

Thursday, December 28.

Shanghai seems to have returned to its normal condition but the place may be said to be still garrisoned by blue-jackets, and according to present appearances these may not be withdrawn for a considerable period, some say two months.

The North-China Daily News, discussing the riot editorially, says:—

We entirely acquit our better-class Chinese fellow-residents of any participation, beforehand or during its progress, in yesterday's riot. In fact, the riot was not, we believe, due to the spontaneous ebullition of any section of our Chinese fellow-residents. It was deliberately planned and prepared outside the Settlement, and salt smugglers, rowdies, and loafers, men of whom the countryside is full, joined, we are assured, by Chinese soldiers in mufti, have been paid to come into the Settlement and make a disturbance. It is not yet known who distributed the placards on Sunday ordering the Chinese to close their shops, but there is good reason to believe that the parties really responsible are the heads of the boycott movement. The mob was reinforced by the members of the beggars' guild, whose chief aim was, of course, loot; and Chinese state that the first victims were Chinese shopkeepers who had not entirely closed their shops. For, owing to the representations made by the guilds, and especially the bankers' guild, who did everything they could to prevent a breach of the peace, the shopkeepers in many cases opened their shops as usual, and only closed them when the riot began. It is impossible to free the Taotai from all responsibility. He was warned, we understand, that his action in the Mixed Court matter was not unlikely to be followed by a riot, and it cannot be said that he did his best to preserve the peace.

The small amount of damage actually done, considering the vulnerability of the Foreign Settlement, is a convincing proof, if any more proof were wanted, that the riot was not the work of the Shanghai people, who know, indeed, that if the riot attained serious dimensions, they would suffer quite as much as foreigners. The actual rioters, among whom we are told the followers of the notorious rowdy leader, Vah Kah-der, were conspicuous, have had a lesson, some twenty of them, it is reported, having been killed.

The above appeared in an editorial on the 19th instant. The following day our contemporary published a translation of an article which appeared in the leading Chinese journal, the Nanfeng-pao:—

"The great mistake was that the mob was not fired on at the very beginning, for no doubt the outbreak would not have been so serious, had a few of the ruffians been killed. Once they had a taste of blood, without receiving punishment, they got bolder and bolder and every foreigner that came in their way was attacked.

"No one deploras the tragedy of yesterday more deeply than we do. The acts of violence were totally uncalled for, and the perpetrators, who had their ulterior motives, should be severely punished. We had thought that the Mixed Court outbreak was to be settled amicably, and that the recent disagreement was on a fair way to arrive at an understanding. "A serious blow has been dealt on China's prestige, which will take years for her to recover."

Such language used by a Chinese journal at the very scene of the disturbance is sufficient indication of the trend of respectable native opinion. Another even more definite indication is furnished by a circular which the Chinese Chamber of Commerce sent out by way of answer to the anonymous posters calling for a strike. The posters were more successful in fomenting disorder than the circular was in allaying it, but the latter is none the less important as a clue to the feeling of the better classes:—

"The case of the Mixed Court outbreak has received the close attention of the Taotai, who immediately notified the Consuls of the matter. The Mixed Court has ceased to sit, pending the settlement of the case, in a matter that will ensure the prosperity and peace of the Settlement. We have already advertised in the papers urging you to remain quiet, and the matter will be satisfactorily settled. Now that His Highness the Duke Tsai Tseh and Their Excellencies Shang and Li are in our midst, we have a court of appeal, and we have already presented a petition. You, the merchants of Shanghai, are requested not to go on strike. This our prayer."

We are glad, said the N.-C. Daily News of Dec. 22nd, to be able to announce on good authority that the arrival of H. E. Chou Fu, the Viceroy at Nanking, who was specially ordered by the Throne to come to Shanghai to settle the Mixed Court dispute, has been followed by the amicable settlement of the trouble on satisfactory terms, and it is expected that the Court will be reopened this morning. Foreigners and Chinese here alike will welcome the conclusion of this unpleasant incident, so fraught with danger to all residents in Shanghai.

On the following day, however the same paper said that according to the instructions of H. E.

Chou Fu, Viceroy at Nanking, the Mixed Court was to have resumed sittings yesterday morning. Yesterday, however, was the Chinese Festival of Tung-chih (Winter Solstice). The inspectors in charge at the various Police Stations were ready with charge sheets and prisoners, and with an armed guard (if ordered), but no order was received by them to proceed to the Mixed Court. It was announced later that the Court would sit this morning and that the Viceroy himself would probably attend. There were no signs whatever of any mob or demonstration in the vicinity of the Mixed Court yesterday, and evidently the Chinese residents generally are willing to abide by the Viceroy's decision.

MILITARY MATTERS.

The Head-Quarters of the Second Division (Sendai) passed Shinjuku station on the 23rd en route for Sendai. Lieut.-General Nishi commanded this Division in the early part of the war. It formed the centre of General Kuroki's Army at the Yalu and it distinguished itself on numerous occasions, especially at Yangtzing when the Russians under Kellar made their great attempt to recover Motien Pass. Subsequently the Division passed under the command of Lieut.-General Nishijima, on the occasion of Lieut.-General Nishi's promotion to be full General. Nishijima had previously commanded the Osaka Division (4th) which made the celebrated flank attack in the battle of Nanshan, when the Osaka men had determined that, at any sacrifice, they would wipe away the reproach of weakness commonly attributed to them.

Lt.-General Nishijima speaks in terms of the highest admiration of the skill shown by the Kobi (second-reserve) troops in the war. He says that these old soldiers never showed the smallest perturbation in the face of sudden attacks by the enemy, and that they seldom failed to turn the tables so completely as to become themselves the assailants. Their manner of taking cover elicited the greatest praise and in all respects they showed themselves ideal soldiers. The General's direct experiences were garnered chiefly in connexion with the eleventh Regiment of the Kobi. We may note that the return of the First Army in now completed as originally planned.

A banquet was given at the Palace on the 22nd instant in connexion with the disbanding of the Imperial Head Quarters. There were present the Elder Statesmen and the members of the Staff. The occasion was made memorable by a signal innovation, namely, the proposing of the Emperor's health in his presence. Marquis Ito was the proposer. He naturally expressed his keen sense of the great honour and distinction of being the one to inaugurate such a custom.

It appears to have been decided that the head-quarter staffs of the various armies will all return to Japan during January, an earlier programme than that originally contemplated. Thus General Oku's staff will leave their barracks on the 1st and embark at Tairen on the 4th; General Nogi's will move out on the 4th and embark on the 7th; General Nozu's will leave on the 7th and embark on the 10th, and General Kawamura's will commence their journey on the 10th and go on board on the 14th. This will not, so far as we can ascertain, cause any change in the order or time of the various armies' return.

General Oshima and his staff reached Tokyo on the 27th at 10.15 a.m. They had a vociferous reception from a large crowd of people. The usual routine was observed; namely, an immediate visit to the Palace and a banquet in the presence of the Emperor. It was the force under General Oshima that fought on the left of the Japanese army in the battle of Nanshan. The General, prior to his return, had been serving as Governor-General of Liaotung.

The staff of the third Brigade of the Second Division also reached Tokyo on the 27th en route for Sendai, under Major-General Ishibashi. They did not alight from the train except to receive the congratulations of General Sakuma and his staff who repaired to the Shinjuku station to greet them.

The Fifth Division's headquarters reached Ujina on the 27th. This Division belongs to the Second Army, so it is evident that the repatriation of the latter is now in progress. The Fifth's Division greatest exploit was at the battle of Telisz.

ADMIRAL SAITO.

On the afternoon of the 23rd instant Rear-Admiral Saito, Vice-Minister of the Navy, invited to a "tea party" at the Naval Club the editors of the Tokyo newspapers and the correspondents who had been engaged collecting news from the Department during the war. Refreshments were served in one of the principal rooms and while the guests, of whom about 130 were present, stood about the tables, the Vice-Minister made a short speech with reference to the preservation of military secrets. The authorities, he said, being from the first convinced that privacy was essential to the successful conduct of strategical plans, took measures to secure it, and though the operation of these measures had not been unattended with expressions of dissatisfaction from some sections of the public, there could be no doubt, he thought, that the end had justified the means, and that the successes achieved in the war had been in considerable part due to the silence in which every item of dangerous information had been wrapped. The newspapers, although the collection and publication of intelligence constituted a prime object in their eyes, had loyally assisted the authorities, and for that the thanks of the Government and of the nation were due to them. If examples were required he might refer to the time when the Vladivostok Squadron emerged from port and inflicted serious injury upon Japanese and neutral commerce; yet, in the face of such a crisis, the press had preserved its sangfroid and had not shown either indiscretion or impatience. So, too, when the Baltic Fleet was on its way to the East and when it was imperative that the position of the Japanese naval base should be shrouded in secrecy, the press had uniformly avoided any revelation of a compromising nature. He assured his hearers that the inclination of the authorities would be to take the people into their confidence and furnish all details about matters of such absorbing national interest. But unfortunately considerations of overwhelming expediency dictated privacy, and it was most re-assuring to find that the newspapers, by their conduct, had shown their appreciation of this necessity. He concluded by repeating the thanks of the Naval Department and wishing success and prosperity to the press.

The Editor of the Asahi Shimbun replied in a graceful speech, the gist of which was that the expediency of the course adopted by the Government had been understood and that the newspapers only performed their duty in seconding official efforts.

GENERAL DANILOFF'S WARNING.

In the Fiji Shimpō we find a very interesting document. It purports to be a translation of a warning issued by Lt.-General Danilooff to the Russian prisoners in Japan. The General sets out by explaining that some 25,000 prisoners have already been removed and that he has received instructions from St. Petersburg to remove the remaining 45,000 as quickly as possible. But he has only 3 steamers available for the purpose, and from Vladivostok, whither the men were to be carried in the first place, came intelligence that murder and pillage were rampant, that incendiarisms were numerous and that the railway had been partially torn up. Under these circumstances the Vladivostok authorities asked how it was possible for them to discharge the duty of housing and forwarding a great number of prisoners, especially as these prisoners were said to be themselves in a mutinous condition. The General was consequently compelled to suspend the forwarding of the prisoners. Subsequently he ascertained, however, that the alleged disaffection did not exist among the prisoners and that their sole desire was to return to Russia. He knows that the prisoners' heads are filled with ideas of liberty. They have read many inflammatory books on the subject, and he himself having perused one of these volumes, understands what kind of literature is circulating among them. He has only one word to say to them. "They are Russians. They love Russia. That must be so since they were born in Russia and are her children. Unhappily Russia has fallen into a most distressful condition. Murder, incendiarism and pillage are the most prominent features of the time. At first the disturbance was confined to the drinking saloons, but ultimately men lost their power of distinguishing between right and wrong, and seizing even women and children, they threw them into the flames while they themselves looked on with drunken eyes, laughing at the cries of agony. The celebrated library at Cronstadt has been burned and at Vladivostok the jails have been broken open and murderers and other malefactors set free, whose outrages the troops take no measures to restrain. In southern Russia the Jews are assassinating and burning. Their victims are innumerable. It should be the aim of the troops to check such horrors, but instead of doing so the soldiers have often taken part with the rioters. This is because the uneducated portion of the Russian people have mistaken licence for liberty. The Tsar, as the troops know, has promulgated a constitution, not out of deference to these deeds of violence but in the interests of good order. By this constitution the people are granted the privilege of freely electing their own representatives, who, in turn, will freely enact laws which the nation is bound to obey. Unhappily in Russia laws are not understood or respected. Is it not patent to every observer that in countries where liberty prevails much more than in Russia, the laws of the land are much more implicitly obeyed? If it is, as it undoubtedly is, for the sake of securing good order in Russia that a constitution is promulgated, what shall be said of those that mark the occasion by disorders of every kind, murder, pillage and incendiarism? You, when you have returned home, will be loyal subjects, and will act as guardians of peace and good order."

POLITICAL NOTES.

The new political party has determined to call itself the "Daido Club," a name which recalls the party organized many years ago under the auspices of Count Goto, the Daido Danketsu. The signification of the term is a party which agrees about essentials and agrees to differ about non-essentials. This new Daido Club numbers 89 members of the Lower House. They are obtained thus:—

The Imperialists	18
The Koshin Club	25
The Yushi-kai	6
The Jiyu-to	14
The Unaffiliated	26

Eighty-nine votes represent a considerable force in the Lower House. They place the new Party on the same footing as the Progressists, who are supposed to command 90 votes. A bare majority of the Lower House is 190 (the House numbers 379). The Seiyu-kai have 130 followers. Hence it is evident that if, as is very probable, the Daido Club support the Seiyu-kai, the latter would have a following of 219. It may be that this prospect has induced Marquis Saionji to form a Cabinet. On the other hand it is alleged, on apparently good authority, that the Progressists also have decided to support a Saionji Cabinet, and that the Marquis had been made aware of this resolve before he entertained Count Katsura's proposals. Naturally Count Katsura also understood all about it. The reasons attributed to the Progressist leaders are that the country has not advanced towards the system of party cabinets as quickly as had been hoped; that, in fact, the time for that form of Government has not fully arrived, and that a Saionji Cabinet is the nearest feasible approach to the desired goal. However these things may be, it is evident that the Daido Club holds the balance of parliamentary power. Allied even with the Progressists, the two parties would command 179 votes.

Count Katsura announced to the Cabinet on the 21st instant that Marquis Saionji had agreed to undertake the task of forming a new Ministry. The announcement was received with approval and the members of the Cabinet handed in their resignations.

It is not likely that this change will be definitely made until after Baron Komura's return. In the meanwhile the Emperor will hold the resignations and the Ministers will continue to discharge their functions.

The expectation is that the present holders of the portfolios of War and the Navy will remain unchanged.

It is alleged that Count Katsura and Marquis Yamagata have promised to assist the Saionji Cabinet in the Upper House.

The Fiji Shimpō talks of a combination Cabinet, but does not pretend to give any accurate forecast. Its idea is Messrs. Hara Kei and Matsuda Masahisa representing the Seiyu-kai; Messrs. Komatsubara Eitaro and Yamagata Isaburo representing Marquis Yamagata; and Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku and Baron Suyematsu representing Marquis Ito. All prophets speak of Mr. Kato Takaaki for the portfolio of Foreign Affairs.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun alone writes that things have not gone so far as the public seem to imagine. Marquis Saionji has not yet definitely consented to form a Cabinet: he is only considering the question. Nevertheless the Nichi Nichi agrees that a change of Ministry is imminent.

The Daido Club has issued a manifesto, but, as might have been expected, it is merely a compendium of laudable intentions. The compilers disavow any consciousness of such things as toha (parties) or hambaisu seifu (clan government), and profess to see only Sovereign and country. They have appropriated to themselves such fine purposes that if they manage to achieve even a part of their programme they will have deserved well of Japan. At present they evidently mean to be regarded as independents, but it is not likely that they will be suffered to retain that character for very long. At all events the idea of forming themselves into a consolidated party at this juncture is distinctly clever. They will hold the balance of power in the Lower House, and the possession of such an asset will invest them with great importance.

The Committee of the Seiyu-kai have passed a resolution that at the opening of the Diet they will confine themselves to duly answering the Speech from the Throne and offering their congratulations to the Sovereign. Everything in the way of censure of the Government will be reserved until the commencement of proceedings after the New Year's recess. The Progressists have decided to pursue a similar course, but they do not wish to be understood as forming any general coalition with the Seiyu-kai. They acted in common with the latter throughout the war because they considered that such union was essential to the national cause, but although they are one with the Seiyu-kai in seeking to bring about the reality of party government, and although they would welcome the Seiyu-kai's accession to administrative power as a step in that direction, they nevertheless believe that an opposition is one of the most essential and wholesome elements of such a system, and that a Cabinet enjoying the continuous support of the two great parties would not offer to the nation suitable materials for those occasional changes of Ministry which are at once desirable and useful. It may therefore be assumed that if Marquis Saionji forms a Ministry, he will have to reckon on the organized support of the Seiyu-kai only, though there is not much immediate probability of serious opposition at the hands of any other body of politicians.

The Progressists have re-elected Messrs. Oishi and Inukai to be their leaders in the House of Representatives. At the meeting where this election was made Mr. Oishi delivered an address. The gist of it has already been outlined in declarations of the Progressists' policy. Mr. Oishi, while explaining that the Progressists and the Seiyu-kai had worked hand-in-hand throughout the war because they were persuaded of the national benefits accruing from such a course, said no cooperative agreement existed between the two parties now that peace had been restored. Nevertheless the Progressists would welcome a cabinet under the leadership of Marquis Saionji as a distinct step in the direction of constitutional ministries, and since the speedy overthrow of such a Cabinet must confer a new lease of life on the clan statesmen, the Progressists would regard such an overthrow with regret. In effect Mr. Oishi intimated that a Seiyu-kai Cabinet need not anticipate vehement opposition at the hands of the Progressists.

On the whole it is probable that Marquis Saionji's Cabinet will come into power under most happy auspices. It will have the support of the Seiyu-kai and of the Daido Club, which two parties muster a substantial majority in the Lower House, and it will be secure against hostile obstruction on the part of the Progressists. This latter security, however, can not be other than short-lived. The Progressists must assert themselves. They will not consent to be effaced.

It is alleged that the measures for organizing the new Cabinet have progressed most satisfactorily though nothing will be definitely known until Baron Komura's return. The Hochi Shimbun alleges that six names are certain to appear upon the slate, namely, Baron Suyematsu Kencho, Mr. Tsuzuki Keiroku, Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, Mr. Hara Kei and Mr. Makino Shinken. Our contemporary adds that Admiral Yamamoto and General Terauchi have consented to retain their portfolios. Thus two chairs alone remain to be filled, and the occupants of these will be chosen probably from among the immediate friends of Marquis Saionji; in other words, from among the followers of Marquis Ito and Count Inouye.

It is stated that Baron Sone will be the leader of the Daido Club. There was a disposition to elect Viscount Watanabe Kunitake, but Baron Sone's adherents carried the day. Of course Baron Sone can not accept the position so long as he remains in office.

A WONDERFUL CHARGE.

We have frequently had occasion, in the course of a somewhat lengthy journalistic career, to undergo a process which will doubtless be inevitable so long as humanity retains its present constitution, the process of misrepresentation. Familiar as the experience is, however, we confess to a feeling of profound astonishment at finding that an article which appeared in these columns on the 19th instant is described by a local contemporary as an attempt "to arouse international feeling" and "to excite racial prejudices." The article was headed "Germany under the lens." It was divided into two parts. The first part summarized what Japanese journals had recently written about Germany's action in proposing the withdrawal of the foreign garrisons from Pechihill. The second part essayed to prove that the suspicions entertained by the Japanese journals in question were ill-founded, and that Germany's action did not justly lend itself to such an unfavourable construction. This second part commenced with the words:—"In the vast majority of cases folks that delve deeply for motives leave the truth behind them on the surface," and ended with the words:—"Of deliberate choice Germany has frankly embraced the good cause, the conservation of China and the open door with equal opportunities for all. It is a little hard that when she really espouses the right side with honest intentions, she should become the victim of far-fetched suspicions." Yet this is the article which our local contemporary makes the text for a long sermon and characterizes as "a flagrant social offense," "the casting of a firebrand into a social community constituted as this is." We have heard of critics who never cut the pages of books given to them for review, but we had never conceived the idea of a newspaper editor undertaking to denounce an article without reading it. The performance is quaint, and in this instance it has betrayed the performer into construing as an attack on Germany an article written frankly in her defence.

FUNCTIONS AND ORGANIZATION OF THE RESIDENCY-GENERAL.

Imperial Ordinance No. 267 embodies the following regulations with regard to the composition and duties of the Residency-General and Residencies in Korea:—

1. There shall be a Residency-General in Seoul in Korea and in it there shall be a Resident-General.

2. The Resident-General shall be a Shimin official.

The Resident-General shall be under the direct control of the Emperor. Acting with regard to foreign affairs by the intermediary of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and with regard to other business through the Minister President, he shall address the Throne and seek sanction.

3. The Minister-Resident shall represent the Imperial Government in Korea. He shall have general control of all business relating to foreigners and the foreign consulates in Seoul with the exception of such as passes through the Foreign Representatives resident in the Empire. He shall at the same time supervise whatever Korean administrative business relates to foreigners.

The Resident-General, in accordance with Treaty, shall oversee all administrative business carried out by Imperial Authorities and Offices in Korea, and shall further discharge all functions of supervision hitherto devolving on the Imperial Authorities.

4. Should the Resident-General deem such a course necessary for the better preservation of peace and good order in Korea he shall give orders to the officer commanding the garrison army in Korea for the employment of military force.

5. The Resident-General shall inform the Korean Government as to any Korean administrative functions whose discharge is necessary for giving effect to treaties and shall require that they be carried out. When urgency is needed in carrying out such functions, he may at once communicate with the Korean local offices concerned, and may cause the functions to be carried out, subsequently reporting the fact to the Korean Government.

6. The Resident-General shall superintend officials of the Imperial Government and such others as are in the employ of the Korean Government.

7. The Resident-General shall issue ordinances of the Residency-General and shall be competent to punish violations of them with imprisonment not exceeding a year or a fine not exceeding 300 yen.

9. The Resident-General shall control all the officials under his direction. He shall address the Throne through the Prime Minister with regard to dismissals or appointments of Sonin officials, but in dealing with Hannin officials or those of inferior rank he may act on his own authority.

10. The Resident-General shall address the Throne through the Prime Minister with regard to the promotion or decoration of officials under his direction.

11. In addition to the Resident-General, the Residency-General shall comprise the following:—

1 Director-General of Bureau of General Affairs, a Chokumin official.

1 Director of Bureau of Agriculture, Commerce and Industry, a Chokumin or Sonin official.

1 Director of Police Bureau, a Sonin official.

1 Private Secretary, a Sonin official.

7 Secretaries, Sonin officials.

2 Police Inspectors, " "

5 Engineers, " "

10 Interpreters, " "

45 Clerks, police-constables, assistant engineers and student interpreters, Hannin officials.

12. The Director-General of the Bureau of General Affairs shall assist the Resident-General in directing the duties of the Residency-General.

22. Residencies will be established wherever necessary. The Resident-General will fix these places and the limits of the jurisdiction.

23. To each Residency the following officials will be appointed:—

Resident (Riji-kun) a Sonin official.

Vice-Resident (Fuku-riji-kun) do do

Clerks Hannin officials.

Police Constables do

Student Interpreters do

In addition to the above, should the Resident-General consider it necessary, a police inspector (an officer of Sonin rank) shall be attached to a Residency. In offices where two Vice-Residents or more are appointed, one of them shall be senior and shall discharge all legal functions. The personnel of a Residency shall be specially determined.

24. Residents shall be under the orders and supervision of the Resident-General, and shall discharge the duties originally pertaining to Consuls in Korea together with such duties as the treaties and the laws require Residents to perform.

25. Should it appear to a Resident that there is urgent necessity for such a step in the interests of public peace and good order and should there not be time to seek instructions from the Resident-General, he may communicate with the officer commanding the Imperial troops stationed in the region under his (the Resident's) jurisdiction and may ask him to send out troops.

26. Should it appear to a Resident that there is urgent necessity in connexion with the treaties, and should he consider that there is not time to seek instructions from the Resident-General, he may immediately communicate with the Korean local officials concerned, may cause them to discharge the functions in question, and shall subsequently report the facts to the Resident-General.

27. Residents shall issue the ordinances of a Residency, and may enforce them by means of penal regulations, fines not exceeding 10 yen, or detention.

The regulations are 33 in all but their interest is confined to the articles quoted above.

There are three other Imperial Ordinances.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE No. 268.

Organization of the Communications Bureau in the Residency-General.

1. The Communications Bureau in the Residency-General shall be under the control of the Resident-General, and shall discharge duties relating to posts, post-office orders, postal savings banks, telegraphs and telephones in Korea.

The salary of the Director-General shall be 4,000 to 5,000 yen annually.

The salaries of Directors of Bureaux shall be 3,000 to 3,500 yen annually.

The Resident-General shall have an entertaining allowance of 12,000 yen annually; the Director-General shall have 3,000 and the Residents 1,500. Ordinance No. 274 also applies to salaries.

The Japanese press is profoundly pleased by the appointment of Marquis Ito to the post of Resident-General in Korea. The Fiji Shimpu says that no other absolutely suitable person was to be found. There might well have been apprehensions that the Marquis would not accept such a position, but, recognising the magnitude of the task and its importance from a Japanese point of view, he has shown himself quite willing to undertake the arduous duties. Our contemporary considers that a parallel case would have been Lord Salisbury's proceeding to Egypt to discharge the functions now performed by Lord Cromer. Marquis Ito will have the confidence of the Koreans as well as of western nations, and success may confidently be predicted. The only thing to be regretted is that the Marquis, whose presence in Japan can not be dispensed with, will not be able to devote any very lengthy period to the direction of the affairs entrusted to his care in Korea. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun is scarcely less gratified. It finds in the new system, as just promulgated by Imperial Ordinance, some points open to criticism, but the presumption is that the framers of the Ordinance were more or less influenced by consideration for Korean susceptibilities. At all events no better man could be found for the post than Marquis Ito and in appointing him the Emperor indicates that he expects great things. The Nichi Nichi shares the Fiji's expectation that Marquis Ito can not absent himself long from Japan, but it believes that he will be able to establish on a firm footing the powers and position acquired by Japan in the Peninsula, and that he will prepare the ground so as to render things comparatively easy for his successor. The Asahi Shimbun had been anxious to receive some definite explanation of the powers acquired for the Resident-General under the new Convention, and it finds that the required particulars are furnished by the Ordinance just issued. Marquis Ito will be under the direct control of the Emperor. He will carry with him to Korea all the prestige of a great career and full competence to exercise his functions in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. There is in Japan an unconstitutional feature; namely, a little band of statesmen who stand above the Cabinet and above the Diet. The Asahi has always felt bound to combat this unconstitutional feature whenever indications of the camera power are thrust upon public attention, but it nevertheless recognises fully what the country owes to the Meiji statesmen and what history will say of them. Marquis Ito is the greatest among the survivors. It is fitting that he should undertake the great task awaiting him in Korea, and if Marquis Yamagata would proceed to Manchuria and Count Inouye or Count Matsukata as Ambassador to St. Petersburg, the Asahi would be thoroughly satisfied. It may seem to some people like a case of the old Chinese proverb "taking a butcher's axe to kill a barn-yard fowl." But that is merely a failure to comprehend the nature of the problem awaiting solution in Korea. Undoubtedly the establishment of the Residency-General looks formidable when contrasted with the insignificance of Korea, and undoubtedly the expenses will be heavy. But the burden is inevitably thrust on Japan, at least during the years that must intervene before Korea can bear it.

These extracts convey a tolerably clear idea of the writings of the Tokyo press. The Nippon frankly admits that while the presence of Marquis Ito in Japan seems essential at this moment when the administrative power is about to be transferred to the men who may be called his children and disciples, nevertheless politicians who share the Nippon's basic contention that the Meiji Statesmen should be removed from the stage of domestic politics, will welcome this appointment. Still our contemporary hopes that the Marquis will return when he has laid the foundations of a satisfactory system in Korea.

THE CHINESE STUDENTS.

The Chinese students still remain on strike. Viscount Nakaoka and Viscount Okabe have done everything in their power to placate the students on the one hand and to induce the authorities to give to the new regulations the most liberal possible interpretation on the other, but although the Authorities have not failed to respond, the students continue obdurate. Not one of them has resumed his school work. The Japanese Government is said to have decided that these recalcitrant youths must be suffered to go their own way. There is no other course. If they all return to China, it can not be helped.

Of course there is one point to be noted, namely, that the schools are on the point of closing for the new year's recess, and that, consequently, the students, by remaining on strike, do not lose much in the way of instruction. Meanwhile it is said that several of them are taking advantage of the situation to indulge in all kinds of dissipation.

KOREA.

Saturday, December 23rd.

Some of the motive-grubbers who infest every political stage have been proclaiming that Marquis Ito's acceptance of the post of Resident General in Korea is dictated by a desire to avoid political troubles at home and to find for himself a position of ease and influence. Marquis Ito has allowed the Nichi Nichi to publish his comments on such unworthy insinuations. He justly points out that were he in search of ease and repose the last position suggesting itself to him would be that of Resident General in Korea, where a task of the greatest magnitude has to be undertaken; a task abounding with difficulties and yet of the most vital importance to the prosperity and tranquillity of the whole of East Asia. That a man considerably over sixty years of age should deliberately consent to discharge such a service certainly does not suggest any shrinking from responsibility or difficulty. The Marquis hopes that he will be able to have his suggestions frankly welcomed by the Emperor of Korea, loyally acted upon by Korean officials and gladly received by the people of Korea.

The establishment of the Residency General in Korea has been officially announced, and the personnel is as follows: Marquis Ito, Resident General.

(Marquis Ito's post as President of the Privy Council is to be taken by Marquis Yamagata).

Chief of the Affairs Bureau, Mr. Tsurubara Sadakichi. Secretary of Residency General, Mr. Kurachi Tetsukichi.

Private Secretary, Mr. Furuya Hisatsuna.

Mr. Tsurubara was formerly Mayor of Osaka and is regarded as a man of great ability.

There have appeared in the North-China Daily News a series of articles written in Seoul and devoted to setting forth the state of affairs in Korea under Japanese influence. We do not allude to the essays here with any intention of criticizing them at length, but two points are made which seem worth noticing. The first is this:—

Nor has it escaped general notice that the gentleman who occupies the post of Diplomatic Adviser under the August agreement, and whose salary is presumably paid out of moneys belonging to the Korean Government, proceeded to Tokyo during the Portsmouth Peace negotiations and there officiated at the Foreign Office whilst the legal adviser of the Tokyo Government was absent in the United States. It is asked with some show of reason what would happen in Egypt if one of Lord Cromer's trusted advisers, paid with Egyptian gold, was used in Downing Street whenever occasion demanded. . . . It is really unimportant little matters such as these which show that somebody in the Tokyo Government does not look on Korea in the proper way. We are in a position to say that this is wholly a misapprehension. No such interchange of duties took place. The coming of the Diplomatic Adviser to Tokyo had nothing whatever to do with the going of the Legal Adviser from the Foreign Office in Tokyo to the peace conference in Portsmouth.

The second point is this:—

Especially to be censured is the appointment of numberless Japanese police inspectors all over the Korean provinces. The Japanese police has recently so distinguished itself in Tokyo that it would be superfluous to condemn further an institution which too closely resembles the detestable system Napoleon erected under Fouché in France a hundred years ago to be possible in this enlightened age.

This is a wonderful accusation. If there be in Japan any one body of public servants more deserving of praise than another, that body is the police. They are remarkably competent, always courteous and obliging, and entirely free from habits of extortion or corruption. To call the police organization of Japan "a detestable system" is a most singular libel.

Mr. Pak Kang (?), one of the elder officials of Korea, who was arrested some time ago by the Japanese police, is reported to have starved himself to death. The story is that he did not eat for 7 days.

It is reported that the Korean Foreign Office having been abolished, Mr. D. W. Stevens, who has been acting as adviser to the Korean Government in Foreign Affairs, will be released from that post and will return to Washington.

Prince Li Chai-wan has been nominated as Ambassador to Japan in response to Marquis Ito's mission.

Mr. Kiuchi Juishiro has been appointed Director of the Bureau of Agriculture, Industry and Commerce in the new Residency General. This is the official who held the position of Director of the Bureau of Commerce and Industry in Japan at the time of the issue of the new Bourse Regulations which caused such a commotion.

Sunday, December 24.

News from Seoul this morning is to the effect that the Koreans are much pleased at the intelligence of Marquis Ito's appointment, and that among the foreign residents also the announcement has caused great satisfaction.

The trial of the rioters arrested immediately after the conclusion of the new Convention has been finished. Eleven were found guilty. Three of them received a sentence of 3 months' imprisonment with 100 blows, and the remaining 8 were condemned to two months with 50 blows.

It has been decided that, for the purpose of re-organizing the Korean educational system, teachers shall be engaged from the Normal School in Japan.

The Cooperative Warehouse Association established by the advice of Mr. Megata is proving very successful, and there is now talk of a Pyong-yang branch.

The rumour that a certain Mr. Pak Kang had starved himself to death, proves to be untrue. The old man is still alive and his condition is said to be not at all perilous.

Monday, December 25.

The Jiji Shimpo has news from Seoul that a Russian officer, having the rank of lieutenant-general, has commenced to have the Russian Legation repaired. We are inclined to connect this rumour with another (Nichi Nichi Shinbun's telegrams) which speaks of a certain M. Resoff as acting in the professed capacity of Russian representative. It is alleged, however, that the French Authorities have officially denied that he has any authority to be so regarded.

The Korean Government are said to be adopting measures evidently intended to be self-assertive. They have issued regulations with reference to the building of private railways and with reference to changes of local jurisdiction areas without consulting the Japanese. Mr. Hagiwara is reported to have remonstrated. Mr. Megata, also, has been obliged to complain that although the new rules for the control of weights and measures have been put into operation, no salaries are forthcoming for the officials concerned.

Marquis Ito is reported to have stated that his prime purpose in Korea, where he expects to pass 5 or 6 years, will be to secure the prosperity and happiness of the people of the country. He goes to Seoul not for the purpose of oppressing the Koreans but for the purpose of promoting their interests. *Not the least vigorous feature of his programme will be to deal with the Japanese adventurers who have given their country a bad name in Korea. They shall be treated without mercy, and the Marquis thinks it highly probable that he will have to endure some criticism and abuse at the hands of these persons. The mistake made by Japanese politicians hitherto in dealing with Korea has been that they paid attention chiefly to the task of placating the court and its supporters instead of making the people their first consideration.

Thursday, December 28.

An insurrection in the southern part of Chhunchon-do is said to have for its object the reversal of the recently concluded Convention. The insurgents are reported to have obtained 80 stand of rifles from the local officials and to have been joined by the volunteer troops. A Japanese called Hayakawa is also believed to be furnishing arms and ammunition.

The Korean Government, in view of prevailing distress, have decided to postpone the collection of the taxes for 5 months.

It is reported that the Authorities (Korean) are determined to enforce from the new year the edict relating to change of colour in costume. The Emperor himself will set the example. This seems a trivial matter, but it has more importance than sumptuary laws in general, for the prevailing habit of wearing only white garments is at once extravagant and enervating.

The Korean Government is said to have conceived the idea of borrowing from Japan another sum of 1½ million yen to form the capital of a new bank. The original project was to use this money as capital for the Notes Associations, which have been formed under the auspices of Mr. Megata and which are said to be succeeding admirably. But on referring the matter to the merchants of the capital, they expressed themselves in favour of a bank. There are already two native banks in Korea, the Tenichi Ginko and the Kanjo Ginko, but Mr. Megata tells us in his report that their capital is small and their organization imperfect; and he adds:—"Their directors are far from being men of business and in short these banks are such only in name and enjoy no confidence." Therefore the First Bank (Japanese)—we learn from the same report—has taken them in hand and is reorganizing them. Apparently the plan alluded to above is to establish a third native bank, but Mr. Megata's assent has not yet been obtained. Meanwhile the Note Association of Seoul is said to be fully warranting the forecast of its founder. It gave an entertainment on the 27th to celebrate its inauguration of business. About 150 leading merchants were present, representing China, Korea and Japan.

We hear, says the Seoul Press Weekly, that a Russian captain, who recently came to this country and who is now staying in Seoul, has applied to the Japanese Legation begging that the Branch Offices of the Eastern Chinese Railway Company which are now occupied by Japanese, should be given up to him as a representative of Russia, but the Japanese Minister has naturally refused this application, as the French Minister, who is in charge of all matters connected with Russian interests, had given no confirmation to the statement.

Captain Prince Fushimi has been appointed commander of the Takachiho belonging to the South China squadron. Rear-Admiral Yamada, Commander of the first squadron of the First Fleet, has removed his flag to the Tokiwa.

THE INCOME TAX.

One of our local contemporaries has employed its editorial columns for the purpose of ventilating a case which is said to have occurred in Yokohama in connexion with the payment of income tax. The law as it stands at present provides that statements of taxable incomes have to be made in April every year. Should it happen, however, that a statement of income proves to have been over-estimated, a representation in that sense may be made at any time up to the 31st of January in the following year, and the authorities are bound to give due consideration to such representation. They have competence even to suspend collection of the tax until the payer's protest has been duly examined. It is alleged by our contemporary's informant that a representation having been duly presented the authorities refused to attach retrospective force to it, and ruled that there could be no correction of an income after the tax had once been collected on it. We apprehend that there must have been some misunderstanding in this case. The law can not possibly bear such a construction. Its provisions are quite clear. Whether a tax has been collected or not, it must be reduced if just cause can be shown. We are assured officially that this is the case. Of course there are instances where a correction can not be allowed to have retrospective validity. For example, if a man, being in receipt of a taxable salary, loses his employment but fails to report the fact until after he has paid the full amount of the tax for the term. Doubtless if he showed good and sufficient cause for such failure, the circumstances would be taken into account; but if the failure is due to his own negligence solely, he is evidently not entitled to any refund.

Another grievance stated by the same journal is that a foreign residents' goods were distrained owing to non-payment of the income-tax for one quarter of the year, whereas the foreigner was under the impression that payment had been duly made. This incident arose from the fact that the foreigner had no knowledge of a change effected by the tax-officers during the current year, a change, namely, from half-yearly payments to quarterly. But this state of ignorance should not have existed, for the fact that the tax is now collected quarterly may be clearly gathered from the tax-papers. There is, indeed, no distinct assertion of the change, but a little scrutiny of the figures on the papers make the point quite patent. The aggrieved foreigner seems to have carried a complaint to the British Consulate. There he was naturally told that he had no case, a result which induces our contemporary to strongly censure the Consulate on the ground that Englishmen have a right to expect from their own authorities protection against an illegal action. The trouble is, however, that there was no illegal action. Tax-papers must have been duly served and the tax was not paid. Under these circumstances the next step in due sequence is distraint. We should be inclined to suggest that for the sake of mutual convenience it might be wise to practise greater explicitness with regard to the collection of taxes from the foreign residents, but the suggestion would create an impression that the present system does not work satisfactorily whereas there is no evidence that such is the case. On the contrary, the above complaint seems to be the first that has been published.

Perhaps it should be explained that the substitution of the quarterly system for the half-yearly does not signify any larger levy of tax. The amount collected remains unchanged. What induced the authorities to make the alteration is that the great majority of tax-payers prefer four small levies in the year to two large ones.

ADMIRAL TOGO'S MESSAGE TO THE UNITED SQUADRON.

We have already made brief reference to the message addressed by Admiral Togo to the United Squadron on the occasion of its dispersal at the close of the war, but as the document has much interest we now translate it in full:—

"The war of twenty months' duration is now a thing of the past, and our United Squadron, having completed its functions, is to be herewith dispersed. But our duties as naval men are not at all lightened for that reason. To preserve in perpetuity the fruits of this war, to promote to an ever greater height of prosperity the fortunes of the country, the Navy, which, irrespective of peace or war, has to stand between the Empire and shocks from abroad, must always maintain its strength at sea and must be prepared to meet any emergency. This strength does not consist solely in ships and armament: it consists also in immaterial ability to utilize such agents. When we understand that one gun which scores a hundred per cent. of hits is a match for a hundred of the enemy's guns each of which scores only one per cent., it becomes evident that we sailors must have recourse before everything to the strength which is over and above externals. The cause of the triumphs recently won by our Navy is largely to be attributed to the illustrious virtues of the Emperor, but it is to be sought also in habitual training which enabled us to garner the fruits of the fighting. If then we infer the future from the past, we recognise that though war may cease we can not abandon ourselves to ease and rest. A soldier's whole life is one continuous and unceasing battle, and there is no reason why his responsibilities should vary with the state of the times. In days of crisis he has to display his strength; in days of peace to accumulate it, thus perpetually and uniquely discharging his duties to the full. It was no light task that during the past year and a half we fought with wind and waves, encountered heat and cold, and kept the sea while frequently engaging a stubborn enemy in a death-or-life struggle; yet, when we reflect, this is seen to have been only one in a long series of general manoeuvres, wherein we had the happiness to make some discoveries; happiness which throws into comparative insignificance the hardships of war. If men calling themselves sailors grasp at the pleasures of peace, they will learn the lesson that however fine in appearance their engines of war these, like a house built on the sand, will fall at the first approach of the storm. From the day when in ancient times the Empress Jingu conquered Korea, that country remained for over 400 years under our control, only to be lost immediately so soon as our navy declined. Again when under the sway of the Tokugawa in modern days our armaments were neglected, the coming of a few American ships threw us into distress, and we were unable to offer any resistance to Russia's attempts against the Kuriles and Saghalien. On the other hand, if we turn to the annals of the Occident, we see that at the beginning of the 19th century the British Navy which won the battles of the Nile and of Trafalgar, not only made England as secure as a great mountain but also by thenceforth carefully maintaining its strength and keeping it on a level with the world's progress, has throughout the long interval between that era and the present day safeguarded the country's interests and promoted its fortunes. For such lessons, whether ancient or modern, Occidental or Oriental, though to some extent they are the outcome of political happenings, must be regarded as in the main the natural result of whether the soldier remembers war in the day of peace. We naval men who have survived the war must take these examples deeply to heart, and adding to the training which we have already received our actual experiences in the war, must plan future developments and seek not to fall behind the progress of the time. If, keeping the instructions of our Sovereign ever graven on our hearts, we serve earnestly and diligently, and putting forth our full strength, await what the hour may bring forth, we shall then have discharged our great duty of perpetually guarding our country. Heaven gives the crown of victory to those only who by habitual preparation win without fighting, and at the same time forthwith deprives of that crown those who, content with one success, give themselves up to the ease of peace. The ancients well said:—"Tighten your helmet, strings in the hour of victory."

(Dated) 21st December, 1905.

EFFECTS OF THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

At the close of a lecture delivered at the Junior Constitutional Club, the lecturer, Mr. Maxse, said.

That the Anglo-Japanese Alliance had brought an Anglo-Russian settlement on the horizon was neither the last nor the least of its achievements. Wonders would never cease, and there might be even some hope of our relations with Germany. No Englishman, so far as he knew, cherished any animosity towards the German people, whose fine qualities excited admiration not untinged with envy. Our quarrel was solely with the German policy. No one threatened any legitimate German interest; no one in this country coveted a single inch of German territory in any part of the world, either in Europe, Asia, or Africa. At the same time other Powers could not allow themselves to be hounded on against one another by the international agent provocateur, and we lived in hopes that the devious devices, which of late years had made a by-word of German diplomacy, might be discarded, and that Germany might set herself to work to regain the regard of the civilized world which the Bismarcks and Bülow had done so much to forfeit. Germany could not expect to enjoy the confidence of her neighbours unless she abandoned those of her ambitions which could only be achieved through universal war.

Is it to be fairly classed among "wonders" that Germany and England should return to the really friendly relations which once existed between them? We can very vividly remember the time when practically all Germany's trade in the East was conducted under British auspices. The German enjoyed in British colonies and British settlements exactly the same advantages that Englishmen enjoyed, and very shrewdly he took advantage of them. In those days German subjects and British subjects regarded each other with the most amicable eyes and never conceived the possibility of a rupture of friendship. Coming down a little later we can recall the time, only twenty years ago, when among all the Powers conventionally connected in Japan, Germany and England were on the most intimate terms. The British Representative had explicit instructions to march hand in hand with his German colleague, and the German colleague was similarly directed from Berlin. It is useless to analyse the causes that disturbed that pleasant state of affairs, but it is not useless to recall the mood that then existed on each side, for what the two nations were to each other in those days, that they certainly can be again. We have to make up our minds to the fact that Germany's difficult position in the middle of Europe necessarily dictates a policy which can not be always free from devious elements, but the German people are not answerable for such a policy and have by nature nothing in common with it. No nation in the world is more deserving of respect, though the restless activity of the Kaiser must always alarm prudent people and create an element of uncertainty. We rejoice to see that an influential movement has been started in England to bring about a rapprochement between the two countries which, though they must always be rivals, have a multitude of good reasons to be friends and not one good reason to be enemies.

THE sad death of Mr. Fred Ellerton in Kobe on Christmas Day is referred to very sympathetically by the Kobe papers. This is second son which Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton have lost by typhoid fever. The funeral was largely attended.

CHINA.

It was related some time ago that the Hungtutz had taken advantage of the relaxation of military rule in Manchuria and were giving much trouble. News now comes that they are very active in the Kirin district and that large quantities of goods destined for Kirin are lying at Changchun, whence their owners fear to move them. These Hungtutz are seeking to raid Japanese commissariat stores, and it has been found necessary to guard the latter very strongly.

It is right that publicity should be given to the following in the Far East; it is from the Berlin correspondent of The Times:—

Prince Bülow's organ, the South-German Reichs-correspondenz, defends the German proposal for the withdrawal of troops from the province of Chi-li, and denies that it represents any breach of consistency in German policy. Stress is laid upon the "initiative" adopted by the German Emperor, which, it is alleged, has everywhere met with ready approval. "The German troops in China," it is added, "were never intended to be the means of acquiring a piece of the Celestial Empire for Germany. The idea of a partition of China is a hallucination falsely attributed to German diplomacy. We voluntarily declared our renunciation of a policy of territorial conquest in the Anglo-German exchange of notes in October, 1900. This agreement, with which the other Powers associated themselves, was effected before the war between Russia and Japan and also before the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. These facts dispose of the assertion that . . . we are intimidated by the new alliance between Great Britain and Japan in East Asia and that we have consequently adopted a policy different from that which we had hitherto spontaneously pursued with a view to the maintenance and development of our interests in that part of the world."

The German semi-official telegraph agency states that according to information received in official quarters the Japanese Foreign Minister had already informed the German Minister, Count Arco, in writing that the Emperor of Japan gladly agreed to the withdrawal of the troops of the allied Powers from Chi-li with the exception of the Legation guards. The Japanese Government has been instructed to make arrangements with regard to the date of withdrawal and other necessary measures with Germany and with the other interested Powers.

Commenting on the German Emperor's proposal for the withdrawal of the remaining contingents of foreign troops from Chili—we say "remaining, because, though Germany is credited with taking the lead in this matter, Italy really deserves the credit since she withdrew her troops last April—The Times makes these remarks:—

The Peace of Portsmouth, which the Emperor William assigns as the occasion of his action, marks the beginning of a new epoch in the Far East. It closes a war in which Japan fought, not only for her national existence, but for the integrity of China; and in China, not less than the two lately belligerent countries, the consequences of the new state of things will be plainly seen. Fresh forces of industry and progress have been released, and it seems impossible to set limits to the material development of China under the guarantees now established for territorial integrity and the principle of the open door. This principle is secured more firmly than it has ever been secured before by its consecration in the new Anglo-Japanese treaty. At the same time, and by virtue of the treaty, an unparalleled opening is offered to British commerce. The guarantee of equal opportunity assures us a fair field in the vast Empire which we were the first to develop. Our alliance with the victors in the recent struggle gives us a peculiar prestige in the Far East which we have never had before. It remains for our business men, supported by the effective help of the Government and the intelligent interest of the nation, to make the most of the great openings which the new era promises. The terms of the commercial struggle may be fair, but it will be incomparably keener than it has been in the past, and we shall need more energy and forethought than we have always cared to show if we are to be successful. The dominating control exercised by the railways over Chinese development will have to be more keenly realized and acted on. Not all the obstacles, of course, have been cleared out of the way. At the dinner of the China Association last night the chairman alluded to the dead-weight of Chinese officialdom, stubbornly opposed to reform because reform means a decrease in its personal profits. China is beginning to show marked signs of progress, but it may be long before the passive force of bureaucratic obstruction is finally swept away. These difficulties, however, must be faced and dealt with. Our partners in the new alliance will certainly not hold back. We may depend upon it that nothing will daunt the Japanese in their effort to capture markets in China. Our older commercial competitors will be fully alive to their opportunities too. Under these conditions nothing but thorough-going application can maintain our important Chinese interests in the place they ought to occupy.

The tone of The Times seems to be just a little too optimistic on this occasion; or at any rate it fails to take note of China's recently developed mood, the riken fukushu fever as the Japanese call it. China seems to have developed an absorbing eagerness to be a China of the Chinese; to drive the foreign concessionaire out of the gates, taking back what he has already obtained and withholding what he wants to obtain. "The dominating control exercised by the railways over Chinese development" is an unquestionable factor well deserving the terms applied to it by The Times, but just at present the outlook is that the influence of that factor is to be suspended, since the Chinese will not build railways themselves and will not allow foreigners to build them.

H. E. Yu Keng, who came to Japan as Chinese Minister to the Court of Tokyo immediately after the peace of Shimonoseki, died in the international Settlement of Shanghai on December 18th. He had been suffering from a complication of diseases for some time. The official record of the deceased is as follows:—Taotai of Swatow, June 1894; Minister to Japan, July '95; Reader of the Grand Secretariat, October '95; Sub-Director Imperial Stud, December '95; Minister of the Tsungli yamen, January '99; Minister to France, June '99, and on his return to China was made Deputy Commissioner of the Office of Transmission in September 1901. His Excellency and his wife, daughters, and sons resided in Peking until early last year, when they came down to Shanghai, remaining there ever since. The two Misses Yu, who are still remembered in Tokyo for their many accomplishments, acted for some time as interpreters for the Empress Dowager upon the return of the Court to Peking from Hsian. The late Yu Keng was a Chinese Bannerman (Hanchun) and Mrs. Yu Keng, the mother of the two young ladies, is a Eurasian, born of an American father and a Chinese mother.

A glance at the official list of the members of the Travelling Mission, says the N.-C. Daily News shows that the five High Commissioners are accompanied by no less than eighty attachés including secretaries and advisers. A large proportion of the attachés hold Taotai's rank with the brevet and grade red button and peacock's feather, amongst whom we observe the name of Mr. Y. C. T. Tong, Assistant Manager of the Chinese Telegraph Office on the Bund, who has been temporarily detached for service with H. E. Tuan Fang, who left in the P. M. S. Siberia for the United States, in company with H. E. Tai Hung-tze, his colleague and a suite of thirty-three secretaries and attachés. His Highness Duke Tsai Tseh and his two colleagues T. E. Shang Chi-heng and Li Sheng-to are accompanied by a suite of forty-seven secretaries and attachés, two of whom are protégés of Viceroy Chang Chih-tung, specially selected by him to accompany the Travelling Commissioners and take notes on what they see abroad so as to advise the Viceroy what to do or say when the High Commissioners return home, and send up their recommendations on representative government, etc., to their Majesties.

In the early hours of the morning of Dec. 20th a serious collision took place in the lower section of the Shanghai river between two of the China Navigation Company's steamers—the Pekin (Captain Sparke) and the Poyang (Captain Bennett). The Poyang was outward-bound for Hankow and the Pekin arriving from Ningpo. The cause of the collision is as yet unexplained. The result was so serious to the Ningpo boat that she had to be beached on Black Point. She was cut down to and below the waterline on the starboard side, forward of the paddle box, the Poyang's stem cutting a huge hole in her side reaching almost amidships. The Poyang went to the C.N.S. wharves for repairs. One Chinese was killed on the Pekin.

Minister Hu Wei-te has chosen an unfortunate time to apply for sick leave, says the Nanfong-pao. The Government has decided to remove him altogether from his post at St. Petersburg, to which H. E. Ku Cheng-hsiang, Minister to the Netherlands, has been promoted.

The Nanfong-pao states that the Council of Finance presented to their Chinese Majesties for approval on the Dec. 19th specimens of the new coins, accompanied by an illustrated pamphlet giving the rules and regulations with regard to the minting and circulation of the new currency.

THE STREET ELECTRIC RAILWAY.

The Tokyo Shigai Electric Railway Company had a crowded and stormy semi-annual meeting on the 20th instant. There had been much talk about the affairs of this company. In its early days a dividend of 11 to 12 per cent. was paid, and no one wondered, for an electric railway company with lines running through the most populous parts of a city of 1½ million inhabitants ought to be a splendid property. By and bye, however, rumours began to be circulated. People alleged that even an eleven-per-cent. dividend was not warranted by the real earnings of the Company, and that, in order to declare such a dividend, the directors had charged a part of the operating expenses to the construction fund. There was talk too of materials, representing more than a million yen, which had been purchased by peculiar methods and were not immediately utilizable, so that, on the whole, the shareholders might be excused if they felt some uneasiness. When they assembled in the Chamber of Commerce building on the 26th it became at once evident that the atmosphere was murky. Mr. Amenomiya was in the chair. Mr. Amenomiya is the man chiefly responsible for the relatively unprosperous condition of all the electric railways in Tokyo. It was he that proposed the silly and extravagant system of a three-sen uniform fare, a system which fills the cars with long-distance passengers and renders it impossible for any line, however large the traffic, to be a really paying concern. As originator of this system Mr. Amenomiya is much concerned to prove its feasibility, and there has been a supposition that the high dividends originally paid by the Shigai Company were for that reason inspired by him in his capacity of chief director. Probably these stories are unworthy of notice except in so far as they indicate an unsatisfactory state of affairs in the opinion of the shareholders. On the 26th when the accounts were read, it appeared that the directors proposed an 8-per-cent. dividend. The chair immediately began to be assailed with questions from every quarter. Some asked for explanations of the accounts, some demanded more detailed statements as to materials purchased, and some inquired whether there had not originally been an idea of distributing a 9-per-cent. dividend. The propounders of this last query rapidly grew in numbers and vehemence. It was admitted by the chair that a 9-per-cent. dividend might be paid, and as no seemingly sufficient reasons were assigned for not paying it, a definite motion was proposed and clamorously seconded that it should be paid. A recess had to be taken to quiet the malcontents, and finally, after a three hours' session, the accounts were passed as submitted by the directors. This set-back in their career will probably furnish food for thought to the shareholders and convince them of the impracticability of the 3-sen fare. The cars of the Company are almost invariably filled to overflowing, and if a fine dividend can not be paid, the fault must lie with the rates charged. A system which enables one man to ride seven or eight miles for three farthings and compels another to pay the same money for riding a few hundred yards is evidently irrational.

Speaking of this Shigai Company we may instance as an evidence of its mismanagement the extraordinary dilatoriness shown in constructing the line from Kudan along the moat in front of the British Legation. The work offered no difficulties whatever, yet for month after month the public highway was reduced to an almost impassable condition while the company's engineers wasted time doing nothing. It is astonishing that the inhabitants of the quarter endured such incompetence and that the shareholders have taken no public notice of it.

A STORY INDEED.

We have occasionally referred to a small newspaper published in Seoul under the name of the Korea Daily News. It is a journal which attracts attention as having almost a monopoly of the Korean field and devoting itself with unabating zeal to discredit the doings of the Japanese in the peninsula. In its issue of the 13th instant this Seoul journal publishes the following telegram:—

Tokyo, December 12.

One hundred and sixteen officers have been simultaneously cashiered or transferred. The list includes all the navigating officers of the Kashima and the Katori, many other naval officers (some of whom were captains), a number who were on the reserve list and some who had already been suspended.

This telegram is taken by our contemporary as the text of an article commencing with these paragraphs:—

The special telegrams which we publish to-day bear out our oft-repeated contention that there is something very seriously the matter in Japan.

The present sad condition of Russia is being put forth by interested parties as an example of the evils attendant upon a bureaucratic government—or mis-government. But all present indications go to show that the impending state of affairs in Japan will be an equally efficacious object lesson of the pitfalls into which a nation may be betrayed by a military-man oligarchy.

The paper then proceeds to prove that the visit of Marquis Ito to Seoul and the conclusion of the new convention there, were steps necessitated by the quiet state of the Japanese nation and by the conviction of its statesmen that unless some sop were thrown to the people, serious disorder would occur. In fact any one reading the article would conclude, and is intended to conclude, that Japan is in a very bad way indeed.

The whole affair is one of the most comical mare's nests we have ever come across. On the 12th instant there appeared in the Official Gazette of Tokyo a list of 353 naval officers, some of whom were transferred to new posts, some were placed on the reserve or retired list, and some were told off to bring out the Kashima and the Katori, now building in England. The whole thing was a normal consequence of the war. Peace having been restored, the organization of the Navy was replaced on a peace footing, and officers who had been taken from the reserves or the retired list for special service on account of the war, were sent back to the former or replaced on the latter while a number of others were transferred to their old posts. This incident, which naturally failed to cause even a ripple of interest in Japan, is construed by the incredibly ignorant Korea Daily News as "bearing out its oft-repeated contention that there is something very seriously the matter in Japan"!!! It is evident that the Seoul journal's alarming analyses of the mood of the Korean nation may be treated as romances not more consistent with facts than this sententious folly about Japan.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Wakamatsu Foundry seems to have at length justified its troubled existence and Mr. Wada Koreshiro, the ex-director, must feel that his child has not perished on the threshold of vigorous life. The Jiji Shimpō relates that during the war this foundry was entrusted with the duty of manufacturing rails and locomotives for the military lines in Manchuria and it performed the work thoroughly satisfactory. Ultimately the reserve smelting furnace was started and steel was successfully produced on a scale so large that the foundry is now competent to supply the demands of three chief arsenals of Japan. Every one remembers how the original estimate of five million yen for the establishment of the foundry gradually swelled in each budget presented to the Diet, until the great figure of 20 millions was ultimately reached, and after being the object of innumerable journalistic diatribes the foundry seemed likely to be offered for sale to some private company. All that was before the war. We have never heard that the idea of sale was seriously entertained by the Government or that any Company willing or competent to undertake such an enterprise was forthcoming, but it must now be a source of great satisfaction that the sale did not enter the realm of practical politics, and that the foundry is justifying its projectors.

Mr. Edwin Morgan, ex-Minister of the United States in Seoul, is spending a fortnight in Tokyo before proceeding home en route to his new post in Havana, where he has been appointed Minister. Mr. Morgan is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Huntington Wilson at the United States Legation.

A curious incident has occurred in Manchuria. The Russians hold 228 Japanese prisoners whom they promised to hand over at Changtu on the 19th instant. But they conducted the men only as far as Suping-chieh and then took them back to Kungchuling. No explanation whatever was vouchsafed as to the reasons of this sudden change of programme, and the only explanation which suggests itself is that a snow-fall interfered with their arrangements or that they desired to conceal the state of affairs in Harbin, which would of course have become known had the prisoners been handed over, since Harbin had been their place of detention.

It appears that the Pobieda's voyage to Saseho from Port Arthur proved a perilous affair. The ship had been terribly damaged, partly by Japanese shells and partly by the explosion which the Russians themselves contrived. Her engines and machinery were intact—they had been heavily greased before she was sent to the bottom—but her hurts were such that a successful voyage to dock depended largely on the weather she encountered. Once she put back to Tairen to avoid a gale, but on resuming her journey she experienced a three days' storm which nearly destroyed her. The water poured in through her wounds and three pumps constantly worked could barely cope with the leaks. Presently two of the pumps became choked with coal, and only the central compartment kept the vessel afloat. She reached Saseho on the 20th, after a voyage performed at the rate of 5 knots. Temporary repairs will be made at Saseho and she will then come round to Yokosuka.

General Kodama left Kobe on the 25th for Formosa. The distinguished officer evidently considers himself entitled to no rest after his long and arduous labours in Manchuria.

General Ogawa, who was severely wounded at Shaoshanpao, seems to be very dangerously ill. He has developed symptoms of insanity owing to the injury.

General Kuroki and Admiral Kabayama having obtained permission to hunt bears in the Imperial Preserves at Amagi, have had considerable success, each party bagging two bears.

Vice-Admiral Togo (Masamichi) is dangerously ill. The Emperor has sent him the Second Class of the Order of the Golden Kite and the Second Class of the Rising Sun.

A Maizuru telegram received on Tuesday afternoon said that the distinguished Admiral died on Monday night.

We read in the Yorozu Choho that the Russian prisoners at Narashino are in a state of much discontent. Since the middle of this month they have made sixteen attempts to set the camp on fire. Originally they numbered 15,023, but 23 deaths reduced their total to 15,000. Of these 5,387 have already been sent home since the conclusion of peace, and 1,550 were told off for commencing the journey before the close of the year. But some change of programme made by General Daniloff has deferred the departure of this second batch, and thus great dissatisfaction has arisen. Our contemporary's account attributes the origin of the trouble to General Daniloff's vacillation. He is said to be swayed by every wind of doctrine, the plans definitely formed at one moment being incontinently abandoned the next in deference to the suggestion of some stronger will. That, however, may be only a rough reading of the difficulties with which the unfortunate General has to contend, as outlined in his message which we published on the 28th instant.

There appears to be no doubt that Viscount Aoki will proceed to Washington as the first Japanese Ambassador to the United States and that Mr. Takahira, who is now en route for Japan, will be appointed to a European embassy. We congratulate Viscount Aoki on resuming his place in the field of active diplomacy, and we also congratulate the United States on receiving such a Representative of Japan.

On Thursday morning as the Emperor was approaching the gates of the parliamentary buildings a man attempted to present a petition to His Majesty. He was immediately arrested and proved to be one Fujiwara Hidejiro, who had come up on the previous evening from Okayama Prefecture. The purport of the petition was to plead for the pardon of Kono Hironaka and other politicians who are charged with complicity in the riots of September 5th.

All the Russian prisoners have been sent away from 12 stations out of the 28 at which they were held. The Fiji Shimpō says that only 28,536 now remain. If that be the case extraordinary expedition has been employed, but we can not accept our contemporary's figures with explicit confidence; they seem to be only approximations.

According to reports in the Japanese newspapers the long-projected "Japanese ship-owners' Association" is assuming very tangible proportions, and will probably be organized with a capital of 20 million yen. Its projectors contemplate working in co-operation with foreign companies.

THE FAMINE IN NORTH JAPAN.

The rice crop of Japan this year is 17 per cent. below that of the average year and only three-fourths of last year's crop, which was, however, a phenomenal yield. This shortage of 17 per cent. means a loss of eighty-four million yen to the farmers, but if this loss were distributed evenly throughout the length and breadth of the land, few foreigners would know of it except those who are interested in statistical tables. Much more than one-third of this loss is in the three ken, Miyagi, Fukushima and Iwate.

Miyagi Ken, the worst of all, because of the failure of the rice and other crops, has suffered to the extent of eighteen million yen, about twenty yen to every man, woman and child, or more than one hundred yen for every family in the Ken. Rich people, merchants in the towns and certain others, will not feel this directly. The middle class of farmers, who rely on the rice harvest for the support of their families, must sell or mortgage their land. The lower middle class, who farm rented land, have no crop and no land to sell. Officials say that this will be one of the hardest classes to help; for these people, accustomed to work in the fields, only ordinary coolie labour can now be found. Many of them, however, have clothing or some articles of household furniture; these must be sold to eke out a living until next summer.

What might be called the lower class is especially large in the north. Financially this is the poorest part of Japan. The soldiers of the Second Division who come from this region especially distinguished themselves in the late war, but whatever may be said of the bravery, sturdiness and honesty of these people, not many of them are rich in this world's goods. This year when food-stuffs must be brought in from the outside, when they have no money to buy after the food is brought in, and when the farmers have no work for even themselves, the poorest people must receive help from somewhere. In Miyagi Ken more than one-third of all the people, and in the three ken some 700,000 out of a population of 3,000,000, are already on the official lists as paupers (kyūmin) and unless looked after by village, town and city offices many of them will soon die of hunger.

As much land was tilled as in other years, the people worked hard, but there was too much rain and too little sunshine and when the crop was harvested it was found that the heads which looked almost the same as in other years contained only juice which shrivelled up and did not become grains of rice. This is one reason why it was not known until quite recently that there is a famine in the north.

The policy of the officials is to give no help except where absolutely needed. The tax offices are of course open as always and, as is right, all who can must pay. Many will suffer inconvenience and many will know by experience what are the pangs of hunger, but somehow or other more than 2,000,000 of the people will be able to get along. But what is to become of the 700,000 kyūmin? That is as large an army as fought on both sides in any battle of the late war.

The standard of living is already low and the sacrifices made because of the war have made this still lower but there is an irreducible minimum: the people must have something to eat. No one is to be allowed to actually starve to death. In order that there may be no epidemic among the poor their food is being carefully examined by official physicians. The straw cakes, acorns and other unpleasant food are not especially injurious—they satisfy the cravings of hunger and will keep life in the body. A very small quantity of food will suffice to keep a person alive but life cannot be sustained for many months on the diet of these poor people. And besides the supply of acorns and other nuts will be exhausted by February.

The Government, national and local, is doing all in its power to provide relief work but as yet there are no plans to care for the sick and the aged. In time of famine in India after the Government has done all it could there is still occasion for private charity. So here in North Japan there is much room for generous giving to help the people in this their time of great need.

WILLIAM E. LAMPE,
Chairman of the Foreign Committee of Relief.

MADAME HENCKLER'S ENTERTAINMENT.

A very pleasant entertainment was given in Van Schaick Hall on Tuesday afternoon by the pupils of Madame Henckler's musical academy. The day was dark and stormy with heavy incessant rain, but the interior of the Hall was bright with Xmas decorations and in one corner stood a tree laden with presents, which at the close of the programme was lighted up. The attendance was sparse. Proceedings opened with a chorus, "Jack Frost," by the Children's Singing Class, which was followed by a song, "Winds in the trees" (Goring Thomas) sympathetically rendered by Miss Violet Abbey. A piano duet for eight hands—"Fackeltanz" (Meyerbeer)—brought out Misses H. Inouye, Daisy Abbey, Amy Gray and Madame Henckler. Following this came the "Angel's" Chorus from "Eli," by the Young Ladies' Singing Class, and a duet, "Spring Song" (Mendelssohn), Miss Flossie Eagling and Miss Maudie Hearne. Another chorus by the Children's Class—"Tip-toe"—was pleasingly set off by action and won much applause; then Miss Maudie Hearne gave a piano solo, Jungman's "Flower Song"; after which Miss Hatsumi Inouye sang "The Holy City" (Stephen Adams). This gifted young lady possesses a beautiful voice which gives distinct promise of rich development in the future, her upper register being clear and mellow, while her enunciation is most pleasing. No wonder that she received the hearty thanks of her auditors. Later in the programme she gave a piano solo—"Berceuse" (Chaminade)—which was a dainty and artistic performance; for both in singing and playing Miss Inouye displays musicianly instincts of a very high order. Miss Georgie Tresize's piano solo—"Sorrentina" (Theo Lack) was distinguished by a rippling grace of expression which well marked the rapid progress she is making in her musical studies. The tenth item was Schubert's "Serenade," sung by the Young Ladies' Class, and it was followed by a pianoforte solo—"Berceuse" (Schytte)—artistically interpreted by Miss Amy Gray; and then Miss Minnie Cameron led the Children's Class in a pathetic little ballad "What would you take for me, papa?" A piano solo—"A village holiday" (Beringer), by Miss Flossie Eagling; a solo, "Thine Eyes so blue" (Bohn)—Miss Maggie Summers; a song "Kling-ling-ling," by the Children's Class, and a quartette and chorus, "Kentucky Babe," by the Young Ladies' Class, brought the first half to a close. In the second part, Miss Rosie Cameron read the old German legend of "The Nutcracker and the Mouse-King," which was interspersed with musical interludes by Miss Madge Cameron, and Miss Georgie Tresize; the programme concluding with a Christmas Carol by the Young Ladies' Class.

Madame Henckler then announced that the first prize for general efficiency and close application had been won by Miss Hatsumi Inouye; Miss Daisy Abbey won a prize for most advanced piano studies and harmony; Miss Georgie Tresize, a prize for marked progress. Class II., Flossie Eagling, highest marks; Class III., Dorothy Austin. The Christmas Tree was then lighted up and the proceedings merged into general fun and festivity suggestive of the season.

ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE.

St. Joseph's College broke up on Friday December 22, for the Christmas Holidays, and in the afternoon the usual "Séance" for the reading of examination marks was held in the "Rotonde." This room had been in the hands of transformers for some weeks, and presented a very handsome appearance. A neat little stage had been erected, and a circular row of benches constructed round the room.

The "Séance" commenced as usual with an entertainment given by the boys. It consisted of songs, recitations, etc., some good compositions being also read. The marks for the past month and the results of the examinations were declared by the Director, Mr. L. Stoltz, and proved to be, on the whole, very satisfactory. Afterwards Mr. Stoltz, replying to an address made by one of the scholars, reminded the boys of their religious duties and other obligations during the Christmas holidays and he concluded by wishing them all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. BLUFF HIGH SCHOOL.

The annual entertainment and prize distribution of the Bluff High School drew a crowded audience to the Van Schaick Hall on Wednesday afternoon. Proceedings opened punctually, Miss Kilby rising at 4.30 p.m., to make the speech of welcome and deliver a short report on the year's work she said:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—In the name of the Bluff High School I have great pleasure in welcoming you amongst us again at this our annual prize-giving. With regard to the work done during the period under review the year that has passed has been one of steady and hard study. Under Mrs. Hall's most able tuition lessons in French have made rapid progress, and in the last German examination the highest totals reached by girls in the two upper forms were 89 per cent. and 87 per cent., which results show the high proficiency which has been obtained under the excellent teaching of Miss Grautoff. Special attention has been given to sewing this term, and some of the results of work done in this direction may be seen in the doll, which has been dressed by some of the girls and which is to be given away as a prize. I should like to mention here that it was decided to give this doll to "the bestest little girl in the school," as one of the younger children said to her mother. In awarding this prize we found that there were two children equally deserving, so the only way out of the difficulty was to get another doll, and by this plan we hope we have satisfied both the successful little girls. By the kind permission of the Ladies' Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club we have again secured the right of playing hockey on their ground, and we mean to resume our games in earnest after the New Year. Up till now we have had some very enjoyable matches with the Ladies' Hockey Club. The School Library, subscribed to by the majority of the girls, is in a very flourishing condition, and we have been able to order several monthly magazines; these, with over 100 books, have afforded many a pleasant hour to the readers. Our Dorcas Meetings have been held regularly during the year, and for the benefit of those who have not heard of the object of these meetings I might mention that in the same manner as some schools at home we meet together once every month to make something useful for poor children. This year we have worked for the annual Christmas tree given to the Japanese children of St. Andrew's mission at Hinodecho. Before I conclude I should like to take this opportunity of thanking all those who have so kindly given us prizes this year, and helped us in many other ways. The form prizes are being awarded to those girls in the Upper School who have gained at least 80 per cent. of the marks during the term just ended; and to those in the Lower School who have over a percentage of 75 marks. Mrs. Dearing has kindly consented to present the prizes to the successful competitors, and I have now much pleasure in asking her to do so.

Amid applause, Mrs. John Lincoln Dearing rose and said:—

Although I feel my unfitness to fill the place I occupy to-day yet I am glad to have been given the honour of presenting the prizes this afternoon by the teachers of the Girls' High School. For ever since the real beginning of the school it has been my close neighbour, and for the several years of its existence it has been a distinct pleasure to me in my daily walks up and down the lane leading to school and home to meet and greet the bright young folk who make up the school. I have learned to know them all from the wee tots to the girls who are beginning to be young ladies, and I have watched them growing tall, growing from girlhood into womanhood with deepening interest, and when they have least suspected it, I have joined in their sports and fun and frolic from my window across the lawn. And so I am especially pleased to have been asked to help in making all these dear young girls happy, who without perhaps knowing it, are true friends of mine. Another reason why I am glad to have been chosen is because I approve of the school. I know it to be an uplifting sweetening, helpful influence in the community. I know that the girls who are its component parts cannot but be better and sweeter and truer women from their school-days spent in the care of Miss Kilby and Miss Edith and Miss Mary Kilby. Beside the intellectual training, I covet most earnestly for our growing girls the growth in womanly habits and Christian character, and I know that the Girls' High School is not wanting in those things. For however it be, it seems to me the poet was right who said

"Tis only noble to be good,
Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood"—(loud applause).

But do you know, girls, I cannot wholly realize what the happiness of getting a school prize must be; I have to use a great deal of imagination. For the little maid I know the best of all was brought up in American public schools where they have no such luxury as prize-giving, and the only thing that approached it was the grand Exhibition Day at the close of the year. But as memory takes me back I realize that Exhibition Day must have been to the little maid fraught with the same excitement and intense eagerness as Prize-giving day is to you. There were always the night before: the many tight little braids to sleep on in preparation for fluffy hair the next day, which were always most uncomfortable, but what cared she, that little maid, if she could only look well on Exhibition Day? Then there was the most beautiful frock laid out, with all the extras, and at last when she reached the Hall what a flutter used to be in her eager little heart. For there were assembled all the reverend committee men, and there were all the friends and relations and father and mother, watching to see her do her best. And there too was dear teacher with anxiety written on her face. There was always the dread fear lest she might stub her toe in mounting the platform, or, more than all, forget the lines of her essay or poem. But none of these things really happened, and those days are bright spots in the career of that little maid I knew the best of all.

And now to the prizes themselves. I want before giving them to the girls for whom they are designed to congratulate you personally on the excellent work you must have done in school to deserve these beautiful prizes. And I want to congratulate fathers and mothers as they see these rewards given for good and thoughtful study. And most of all I want to congratulate your teachers, the Misses Kilby, on being so fortunate as to have so many bright girls and boys to teach and influence and on what they have done and are doing toward raising the intellectual standard in Yokohama.—(Loud and long continued applause).

Mrs. Dearing then proceeded to distribute the prizes as follows:—

Form Prizes. Form VI: Edith Cain, Emily Fox, Georgie Tresize and Ethel Talbot. Form V: Flossie Eagling. Form IV: Amy Unite, Irene Bell and Marion Fox. Lower Fourth: Hæbe Leppere, Edith Unite. Form III: Dorothy Gavin. Preparatory: Freddy Wolf. Examinations: Form VI: Ethel Talbot. Form V: Daisy Neville. Form IV: Amy Unite. Lower Fourth: Mollie Emerson. Conduct: Upper School: Flossie Eagling, Lower School: Jean Edwards and Marion Unite.

Then followed a most enjoyable programme of songs, recitations and dramatic pieces, which, if a little long drawn out, was of such excellence that none would have wished anything to have been omitted. Many of the girls displayed dramatic and histrionic abilities of no mean order, showing that the younger generation knocking at the gates will be able to sustain the reputation of Yokohama very well indeed in the days to come.

THE CHINESE CHURCH MISSION.

The Christmas Revels of the Chinese Church Mission of the Holy Comforter, Nihonbashi, Tokyo, were held on St. Stephen's Day, Dec. 26th, in the Parish House, No. 54 Tsukiji, beginning at 7 p.m. The inclemency of the weather prevented many from attending. One Korean and some half dozen Chinese students were present. A bag of cakes and a handful of oranges were given to each guest and much gratification was expressed with the entertainment though apologies were made for the lack of due preparation and promises given of better things next year. Letters of congratulation and regret for inability to be present were received from Rt. Rev. Bishop Nicolai, Rt. Rev. Bishop Awdry, Prof. A. Lloyd, M.A., Prof. P. O. Yamagata, Miss M. S. Ballard and others. The mission is conducted by a Committee consisting of Rev. H. S. Jeffreys, Pastor, Mr. Timothy Y. Negishi, Senior Warden, Mr. Stephen T. Hara, Junior Warden, and three others. CHRIST CHURCH SUNDAY SCHOOL CHRISTMAS TREE.

The children attending the Christ Church Sunday School spent a very pleasant evening on Thursday in connexion with the Christmas Tree prepared for them by Mrs. Field, wife of the Incumbent, and other ladies. The Tree, which was set up in the Vestibule of the Public Hall, was most tastefully decorated by Mrs. Field, Mrs. Austin, and Miss Jaques and the presents, toys, dolls, games and the innumerable other objects that delight childhood which loaded its boughs were contributed by members of Christ Church congregation.

About 6 o'clock the Tree was dismantled and its burden distributed among the eager youngsters and soon afterward it was removed into the hall-way and the whole floor left free for dancing and games, in which the children engaged with the keenest zest till 8 o'clock. For the dancing the piano music was kindly furnished by Miss Cameron.

In the course of the evening Miss Daisy Russell, on behalf of the Sunday School children (of whom she is the youngest), presented a pretty mantel clock to Rev. W. and Mrs. Field, which the former acknowledged in a few pleasant words.

Among the ladies who assisted at the entertainment were Mrs. James Walter, Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Frazer, Mrs. Tripler, and Mrs. Esdale.

A SONG OF A STREAM.

O Brook of the Mountain,
I love Thee!
Thy Sire is the black-bearded Storm,
And the Mountain, deep-bosomed, thy Mother.
The Wind is thy Playmate and Brother,
And I am thy Lover warm.

Forth flashing,
Down dashing,
With white feet thou leapest,
With shouting and laughter,— Ha! Who follows after?—
Where sharpest and steepest
The Rocks lift their arms to enfold thee,
Their ancient hearts stirred to behold thee.

Thy wide-streaming hair
To the Wind's gay caresses
Thou laughingly yieldst.
The charm that thou wieldest,
Is't hid in thy tresses
A-blowing all bare?
When the grey shadows fall
And the mystic Moon shines
I hear thy voice call,
Clear and strong,
To the Stars and the Pines,
To the Rocks and the Winds, and to me.
And my heart leapeth free,
And my soul sings her song
In thy song.

O Brook of the Mountain,
God's smile is thy fountain.
Tis Thee I love best!

* * *

O Stream of the Forest,
I love Thee!
Thou walkest the green-wood shades,
Neath the Maple's motherly arms
Thou hidest thy virgin charms,
Shyest and sweetest of maids.

In twilight abiding,
With shadow veil hiding
Thy still, pensive face—
Like a saint's pure with prayer,
With her God only near
And His grace on her grace—
From the world's common stare,
But to him who comes kneeling
With bowed forehead bare
Thy beauty revealing.

Under the fir branches hoar
Where the shadows and lights are playing
The Wood-Fairies gather to meet thee,
The Wood-Lilies blossom to greet thee,
Thy beauty with beauty arraying,
And I am thy Lover pure.

And I lay my cheek on thy cheek,
My lips to thy forehead cool,
Where thou smilest asleep in thy pool;
Or I bend to hear thee speak
Elderest mysteries,
Lore of the forest Trees
And the Winds and the wildwood Flowers,
And the Stars and the silver Showers.

At noon when the woods are mute,
At night when the winds are still,
Then may he hear who will
Thy song like the strain of a lute Heard thro a dream afar,
Liquid and light and low,
Silver and soft and slow,
Singing down deep in the heart
Of one who sitteth apart
With God and the Evening Star.

O Stream of the Forest,
When heart-stress is sorest
My soul thou restorest.
Tis Thee I love best!

* * *

O Flow of the Meadow,
I love Thee!
Stream of the shining plain,
Of the sighing and whispering sedges,
Of the blossoming, odorous hedges,
Of the bountiful levels of grain.

To fields where the cattle graze
Thou singest, to wearisome ways
Of the feet of travel and toil,
To cities of sorrow and moil.

The beast of the field thou befriendest,
To the fowl of the air thou lendest
Thine opal chalice a-brim,
And the grasses drink at thy rim.

Thou tellest by day and by night
Of simple and beautiful things,
Of blossoms and butterflies' wings,
Of bees that hum in the clover,
Of birds that carol a-might
With joy that the winter is over,
Of sunshine and silver rains,
Of orchards blossoming white
And of gold-heaped harvest-wains.

The sunbeams have woven thee brave attire,
Gown of satin and coil of blue,
Brodered thy vest with pearls and gold;
And tho thou comest to places homely
To peasant and sage thou art passing comely,
An Angel of God with a silver lyre,
Walking the earth since the days of old.
And I am thy Lover true.

The children dance on thy marge at morn
When the winds are up and the daisies waken;
At eve by thy flow Love's troth is plighted
And thy banks are Eden with bloom unblighted.
Thy voice bath rest for the travail-worn,
For the troubled soul a peace unspoken,
A healing balm for the heart that's broken,
And a message of God whose faith is shaken,
A song of hope to the soul forsaken.

O Flow of the Meadow,
Joy of the valley and plain.
While earth hath its light and shadow,
While life hath its bliss and its pain,
Tis Thee I love best!

* * *

O Brook of my Childhood,
I love Thee
By thy flowing I frolicked, child-hearted,
When the Angels stood by me
And Heaven was nigh me.
Ah days long departed!

To thy song my heart sang all the day,
To thy dancing I danced, all unknowing
Whence were we, or whither, or why,
Thou and I,

But glad for thy flowing,
Glad for the blue of the sky
That was sprent on thy bosom,
Glad for the robin's lay
On thy green marge a-blossom.
When the world grew wide before me,
And the heavens shone awful o'er me,
When I roamed the ages olden,
When toward the future leaning
Life took on a larger meaning;
By thy pensive current walking,
With the winds and waters talking,
Saw I Boyhood's visions golden,
Thro each dreamland wide and glowing Sang the music of thy flowing.

And when on the morrow
Came Love and came Sorrow,
Twin sisters immortal,
And knocked at life's portal,
Love sang to thy lute
Till Grief standing mute
Set her hand to Love's hand,
Set her song to Love's measure,
Set her pain to Love's pleasure.
What cadence so sweet,
And what lyric so tender,
Till yon fair day we greet
In the wide Summer-Land
Where God's Face is its splendour?

In the cool and hush of the night,
In the stress and strain of the day,
I hear thee singing away
Out of the morning white,
Singing to children at play,
Singing for lovers blest;
Coming in silver stole

To those who suffer and thole,
With message of comfort and rest.
Angel of shining height,
Of forests of ancient calm,
Of meadows of blossom and belm,
To the common dwellings of men,
I hear thee singing again
Song of the shadow and light;
Calling across the years
With a voice of laughter and tears;
Calling across the sea
To the Morning Star, and to me,
For I am thy Lover aye.

O Brook of my Childhood,
Stream of Mountain and Wildwood,
Flow of the Valley and Meadow,
While dureth life's light and its shadow
Tis Thee I love best!

YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

As usual the Christmas entertainment of the Yokohama Literary Society drew a crowded house and even the enlarged limits of Van Schaick Hall were taxed on Friday evening to accommodate all who desired to be present. The rigid barrenness of the platform was, for once in a way, relieved by foliage plants, an innovation greatly to be commended, while other evidences of the festive season were also observable. The programme had a distinctly Christmasy flavour, several of the songs and Mr. F. S. Booth's excellent reading being associated with the great Christian festival. The Bijou Orchestra's three selections were very greatly enjoyed, particularly the closing item, which was a distinct novelty in Yokohama and will bear repetition. Mr. Brady was in good form and his encore song, written by himself and set to music by Mr. H. Grimbale, proved a capital hit at some local foibles which have obtruded themselves of late. The lady singers all received a hearty welcome and gave delightful renderings of the various songs set down to their names. Dr. Emerson and Mr. Dodds were also heard to great advantage. The violin solo by Miss H. Page, the cello solo by Mr. Salinger, and the pianoforte selection by Mrs. R. J. Ward were all notable contributions to a very enjoyable evening. Programme:—

SHIPBUILDING IN JAPAN, FOR 1905.

(COMMUNICATED.)

The mercantile marine of Japan has been considerably increased, largely by purchase from abroad, since the beginning of last year, as shown below:

	Steamers,	above 20 tons.
Dec. 1903	1073	655,772 tons gross.
Dec. 1904	1209	789,494 "
Sept. 1905	1360	927,457 "
	Sailers,	above 20 tons.
Dec. 1903	3514	320,563 tons gross.
Dec. 1904	3523	321,034 "
Sept. 1905	3598	324,307 "

and there were besides 43 ships of 121,260 tons, captured during the last 20 months.

Although the Government and private yards were very busy during the present year in repairing, docking, and refitting of both naval and mercantile vessels for war purposes, yet some of the leading shipyards report increased output, as shown by the returns given below, and the total for the country is considerably greater than that of last year. With regard to naval vessels, 9 T.B.Ds. out of 29 now building at different yards in the country, and a few submarines have been launched. Merchant ships built this year are mostly for coasting service, and the Mitsu-Bishi Works at Nagasaki have the largest output, having launched amongst others a ferry-steamers connecting the Sanyo Railway (Kobe-Shimonoseki line) and the Korean Railway (Seoul-Fusan line), and one large floating dock, capable of lifting 7000 tons, for their Kobe Works. Many wooden steamers and sailing ships, of which only those above 100 tons are given below, were built at Osaka and other places around the coast: but as they are built by small firms scattered all over the country, one has to get the information through the local boards, and the following list is by no means complete, only excepting those for the Kiusiu district, where we have been able to get complete returns.

In response to the Government policy to encourage the improvement of the deep sea fishing boats, by giving subsidies to those built in accordance with an approved design, many fishing boats of Western construction have been projected, and four of them, very small in size, were launched this year. Extensions are now being carried out in the Government yards at Yokosuka, Kure, and Saseho, and also in the principal private yards; a large graving dock 700 ft. long, the largest in the Far East, has been completed in the Mitsu-Bishi Works at Nagasaki, and a ship-repairing establishment for the latter works at Kobe has also started this year.

The following table gives the number of vessels and tonnage docked in the chief private yards:

	Number.	Tonnage.
Mitsu Bishi Co., Nagasaki	152	416,339
Yokohama Dock Co., Yokohama. 115		341,465
Kawasaki Dock Co., Kobe	97	210,884

MARINE ENGINEERING.

The following table shows the Marine Engineering of the year, as given in detail in the ship-building returns.

Many of the small yards at Osaka and other places have their engines built outside, and it is not easy to trace out where their engines come from in those small ships; thus the name of only the principal engine builders are given in the following list

The Imperial Dockyards.
The Mitsu-Bishi Dockyard & Engine Works.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

The bracing and seasonable weather which had prevailed during the previous week created in the minds of people a feeling of confidence that similar conditions would prevail on Christmas Day. Any such anticipation was dissipated when day broke and it was found that the thermometer had gone up with a bound, and that a hot southerly gale was blowing clouds of dust over the country. The rain, which would have been almost preferable, kept off till Tuesday morning when the temperature fell slightly. Under such conditions out-of-door exercise was far from pleasant. The usual indoor festivities, however, were carried through by foreign residents and doubtless the day was agreeably and merrily spent.

In the churches special services took place. In Christ Church there was a large congregation at morning prayer. The service was fully choral and included a "Te Deum" by Simper and a number of Christmas hymns. The service was taken by Rev. C. H. Short and the sermon was preached by Rev. W. P. Field, who took for his text the lessons to be drawn from the Home at Bethlehem.

The service at Union Church on Sunday forenoon included a special anthem, "Arise, shine" (Simper) and two carols from "The Nativity." In the afternoon the children of the Sunday School gave a carol service and collected a goodly sum for the Sendai famine fund. On Monday morning the Union Church, which was decorated for the occasion, held a large congregation. In the course of the service the chorus "Break forth into Joy" from "The Nativity" was given as an anthem. On Sunday the sermon was preached by Rev. S. P. Fulton and on Monday by Rev. E. S. Booth.

A very bright service was conducted on Christmas Day at the Seamen's Institute by the Rev. W. T. Austen.

A large congregation assembled at Christ Church, Yokohama, last night, Christmas Eve, at evensong. The service was very bright and hearty. Beginning with the dear old Christmas Hymn, "Hark, the Herald Angels sing," a Magnificat by Bunnett in F. was subsequently sung, and an anthem, "Nazareth." Following evensong came some carols, among them being "Good King Wenceslas." The solos were taken by Mrs. Jas. Walter, Mrs. P. S. Bent and Mr. E. Lukis.

The disease seems to have extended to places outside Osaka. On Dec. 26th, a case appeared in Nara.

In connexion with the prevalence of the disease in western towns Mr. Kubota, Director of the Bureau of Sanitary Affairs, left Shimbashi on Dec. 25th for the infected districts.

The councillors of the Shimonoseki City Assembly met on Dec. 27th and decided to carry out the strictest disinfecting measures throughout the city. There has been no further appearance of plague.

The Governor of Hyogo prefecture states that two new cases were reported on Dec. 26th. Both proved fatal.

In connexion with the outbreak of plague in western towns, Dr. Kitazato, Director of the Office of the Contagious Diseases Affairs, gave a speech on Dec. 27th in the meeting hall of the Kanagawa Prefectural Assembly, Yokohama. The staff of the City Office, Sanitary Office and about two hundred representatives of various bodies were present. The doctor gave explanations as to the origin of the plague. As to the measures to prevent the spreading of the plague, they advised (1) to eradicate rats; (2) to clean and disinfect ware houses, sheds, etc.; and (3) to enforce disinfecting measures particularly on goods imported from Indian ports which are generally regarded as the seat of plague. He further said a number of medical officers will be sent to India to examine goods before being shipped to Japan.

FIRES.

An outbreak of fire occurred at 2.25 a.m., on Friday, Dec. 22nd, in the house of Sakamoto, dress-maker, Ishikawa Naka-machi, Go-chome, Yokohama. The flames, which broke out in the kitchen, spread throughout the building and extended to the adjoining houses. Fortunately as there was no wind the damage was limited to three houses, although the place stands among many small wooden buildings. Negligence is the cause.

Fire broke out on the morning of Dec. 23rd in the Osaka Tax Bureau, Nakanoshima, Osaka, destroying the building with the official business books, records and documents. The cause is believed to have been a hibachi.

An outbreak of fire occurred on the night of Dec. 22nd in Yamanoi-machi, Otaru, Hokkaido, burning down thirteen houses.

An Osaka telegram says that a triumphal arch in the Nakanoshima Garden, Osaka, was destroyed at 9 a.m. on Dec. 26th by fire. A gas jet is supposed to have been the cause. The arch was completed on Nov. 25th at a cost of five thousand yen.

AMERICAN TOPICS.

Mr. Anson Phelps Stokes, the millionaire philanthropist, recently told the American Society of Naval Architects about the floating fort he has invented, which he claims is the strongest fighting ship in the world. This remarkable vessel is 270 feet long, 150 feet broad, has a displacement of 30,000 tons, 10,000 horse-power, and can steam eight and a quarter knots an hour. It will carry two fifteen-inch guns, sixteen twelve-inch guns and twenty three-inch guns. Each of the fifteen-inch guns will weigh 135 tons. Thus equipped, Stokes said his floating fort could destroy any battle-ship in the world before the latter could get close enough to bring her own guns in range. She is practically four armoured vessels in one, and could fight with all her might when submerged up to her gun deck, in which case she would show scarcely more freeboard than a monitor. "I am a man of peace," said Stokes. "Some friends have criticized my designing a war vessel. The study of the subject has convinced me that nothing we can do will so conduce to peace, as, while seeking to avoid foreign complications, providing adequately for our own defence."

Secretary Root is preparing to initiate negotiations with the British Government for the settlement of questions still pending with Canada. He has been in conference with Mr. John W. Foster, former member of the American-Canadian High Joint Commission, and with men representing the various interests which will be benefited by the removal of all friction in the relations between the United States and the Dominion. He has carefully considered the proceedings of the High Joint Commission, which failed to reach an agreement on account of the Alaskan boundary dispute and the question of reciprocity, and is satisfied, that, with the Alaskan boundary matter disposed of, there is no obstacle too great to be overcome if approached in a spirit of goodwill on both sides. The questions to be settled with Canada and Newfoundland in the order of their importance include: Tariff relations, fisheries, armament to be maintained on the great lakes, transit of merchandise in bond, alien labour laws, mining rights, conveyance of criminals, wreckage and salvage.

Stephen Salisbury, one of the richest men in New England, died at Worcester on November 16th, after a few days illness of pneumonia. The name dies with him. According to the terms of his father's will, he would forfeit his immense estates if he married, and he had no living kin. He was 71 years old. His fortune, estimated as high as $20,000,000, is given to Harvard University, from which he was graduated fifty years ago; Clark University, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, the hospitals and the city of Worcester. He has already given to the city several magnificent parks and buildings, his last public act, announced the day of his death, being a donation of $100,000 to the Polytechnic Institute. It is not known what amounts of his fortune are to be given to various institutions.

Queen Dowager Margherita of Italy has decided to visit the United States next year. She is anxious to see America and travelling incognito will make a tour in an automobile from New York to San Francisco, whence she will take a steamer for Japan.

"Lead, Kindly Light," President McKinley's favorite hymn, has been declared to be unfit as a song of praise and worship of God by Rev. W. A. Patterson of Princeton, Ind., in an address delivered before the United Presbyterian Synod of Ohio at Dayton. Mr. Patterson crit-the song when used as a church hymn in the worship of God and offered as a substitute the forty-third psalm. "The song 'Lead, Kindly Light,'" he said, "may mean anything that any man chooses to make it mean, be he Christian, atheist or Buddhist."

When Prince Louis of Battenberg sailed with his squadron from New York on November 20, for Gibraltar he left behind him an unpaid dentist's bill of $1000. Dr. Wilbur M. Dailey, a dentist recommended by Mrs. John R. Drexel, filled four of the royal visitor's teeth and then presented him with a bill for $1000. Prince Louis offered $200 in settlement, but the dentist refused to accept it. There was an exciting scene between the Admiral and the dentist at the Hotel Netherland before the Admiral sailed. The dentist appeared there to collect his bill. The Admiral was amazed at the figure, and sent his flag officer, Lieutenant Sowerby, to tell Dailey he would not pay such an amount. Dailey said to have refused to treat with an ordinary Lieutenant, and demanded to see the Prince himself. The Prince really had comparatively little ready money, and told Dailey he was an ordinary sailor drawing ordinary pay and he would not accept such an excessive bill. Very pointed remarks were made on both sides. The Prince went away without paying, but he instructed Sir Percy Sanderson, the British Consul-General in New York, to compromise the matter if he could.

The oldest Civil War pensioner in California, if not in the United States, was found dead on Nov. 26th in a hut about six miles west of Salinas. Davis Ross, a native of Bay Quinte, Ontario, Canada, was born November 6, 1807, and came to California during the '50s, crossing the isthmus. He mined in Tuolumne, Sierra, and made a fortune. Later he went broke, and tried Fraser river and Washington Territory. When 55 he enlisted in the First Regiment, Washington Territory Infantry, serving three years. He has four brothers alive in Canada, the youngest being 88. Ross was heir to a large fortune, which he would not claim. Death was due to heart failure.

Midshipman Minor Meriwether, Jr., of Lafayette, La., a member of the third class of the Naval Academy, was put on trial at Annapolis on November 23rd before a naval court-martial on charges that include one of manslaughter in having caused the death of Midshipman James R. Branch, Jr., of New York, a member of the class above him, as a result of a prearranged fist fight which took place on the evening of Sunday, November 5. The sad incident of the death of young Branch under such circumstances has been widely noticed and has called attention to the existence at the Naval Academy of an unwritten code governing the student body, but quite outside the authoritative rules and generally in violation of them. Under the "code," every detail of these fights is fixed, the midshipmen on duty abstaining from reporting them and excusing from formation those connected with them. These facts were very clearly brought out in the cross-examination by Lieutenant Commander Robison, for the defense.

NEWS FROM EVERYWHERE.

A Brussels correspondent states that the question of the succession to the Dutch Throne is occupying the attention of the States-General in view of the fact that Queen Wilhelmina has no direct heir. The obsolete law of the Constitution under which the Sovereign may remarry after a fruitless union of more than five years is naturally out of the question; but it is pointed out that, in the event of the Queen leaving no heir, the next claimant to the Throne would be the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, and after him the Prince of Reuss. The general current of feeling in the eventuality mentioned is in favour of a Regency under the Queen-Mother, while Radical and Socialist members of the Second Chamber are discussing the possibility of establishing a Republican form of government.

Abraham Calender, who said he "saw the Japanese torpedo-boats," stated to be the cause of the Russian Fleet firing on British fishing boats in the North Sea, was at Essex Assizes on Nov. 14th convicted of forging an order of £16 at Parkeston. Counsel said the Russian officials did not accept the prisoner's evidence. According to Sergeant Mules, the prisoner was coming from Ostend, and when he saw a reward offered by the Russian Government he communicated with them. Mr. Justice Grantham: "The story is on a par with the statement that you were well known at Buckingham Palace to Lord Knollys. Eighteen months' hard labour."

The German Emperor, with his royal guest, the King of Spain, took part on Nov. 10th in a wild boar hunt in the vicinity of Hanover, where the two monarchs arrived the previous night in company with the German Crown Prince and a large and distinguished suite. King Alfonso wore the special hunting uniform which the German Emperor confers as a mark of distinction on those of his friends who distinguish themselves as hunters. The sport lasted for three-quarters of an hour, during which time more than 240 boars were driven past the stands. King Alfonso killed 29 boars in 78 shots; the German Emperor 22 boars in 33 shots, and the Crown Prince 18 boars in 32 shots.

One of the first duties of the new French Minister for War was to adjudicate in a dispute between two generals. General Brugère, the generalissimo of the French army, met General Percin, whom he cordially dislikes, in the Bois de Boulogne on Nov. 10th and omitted to return the latter's salute. Piqued at the slight, General Percin asked for an explanation. "I did not see you. Go away," was General Brugère's reply; and General Percin went. He immediately wrote to the Minister for War, asking if he should fight or take the matter as one involving army discipline. At a meeting of the French Cabinet M. Etienne informed his colleagues that he brought Generals Brugère and Percin together in his room, and that, after an exchange of explanations, General Brugère declared that he never had any intention of offending General Percin, and that if he had seen General Percin's salute he would not have failed to return it, as he had recently done on a previous occasion. In these circumstances, the Minister said, he considered the incident closed.

The Archduke Franz Ferdinand, heir presumptive to the throne of Austria-Hungary, has established a record among sportsmen. He has just shot his 3,000th stag—a royal with ten uneven antlers. He shot his 1,000th eight years ago. No performance to equal this is among the recognised chronicles of sport.

A sensational accident that took place in Paris in January last has just had an interesting echo in the law courts. Senorita Inez de la Guerra, a Spanish dancer, was proceeding along a narrow passage in a music hall at Clichy, along which some cages of wild animals were placed, when a lion, stretching out his paw, caught the poor young lady by the head and mauled her shockingly before she could be liberated. Her face will be too badly scarred for life for dancing in public. As she was going through the passage by the director's suggestion, to discuss an engagement with him, the dancer brought an action for £400 damages. In place of awarding this sum—such are the uncertainties of law—the court fined the director £2.

In reply to a telegram from Lord Avebury describing the London meeting in favour of the establishment of better relations between England and Germany, the Kaiser telegraphed:—"I send my sincerest thanks to you and all sharing your feelings of friendship and good will."

The Rev. Roland Williams, better known as "Hwfa Mon," Archdruid of Wales, died at Rhyl on Nov. 10th after a long illness. Starting life as a carpenter he ultimately became a Congregational minister. On numerous occasions he was the representative of the "Gorsedd of the Bards of the Isle of Britain" at Royal gatherings.

The Archdruid's residence when at Llangollen was crowded with trophies. Principal interest, however, attached to the handsome Eisteddfodic robes designed by Professor Herkomer. "Hwfa" was invited to represent Wales at the King's Coronation, but through an unfortunate illness was prevented from attending.

Percy Davis—Percy King.—On October 26th, at Stratford, Cecil Percy Davis, fourth son of Harry L. Davis, C.E., of Upton, Essex, to his cousin, Grace Florence Percy, only child of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest S. If, says the Daily News, "the gardener Adam and his wife smile at the claims" of Lady Clara Vere de Vere, who was the daughter of a hundred earls, we wonder what they think of those of the granddaughter (maternally) of the great-niece of the twelfth Earl of Derby?

CORRESPONDENCE.

YEZO FUJI.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In your issue dated Dec. 15th, there appears an interesting article on "The ascent of Yezo Fuji," by one who signs himself Fan Kwai. At the end of his account Fan Kwai writes:—"From enquiries made from the officials of the Tozankwai, it appears that only two foreigners had climbed to the top before Aug. 19th last, the first being a Frenchman and the second a Korean. Mr. H. E. Daunt, of Kobe, climbed the mountain on the above mentioned date in 3 hours and 20 minutes, closely followed by Mr. R. C. Ross of Yokohama."

Fan Kwai was evidently misinformed. Foreigners had climbed the mountain years before. Indeed, the late Prof. Haight of the Sapporo Agricultural College, some ten or twelve years ago shot a bear among the dwarf pines growing near the rim of the crater. This is only one instance; for others have climbed the "Yezo Fuji."

Again, Fan Kwai states that in Ainu language Kutchan means "place of refuge." Being much interested in the Ainu language I should be very glad if Mr. Fan Kwai would kindly tell me either (a) how he derives this meaning, or (b) who is his authority for this derivation? As I am seeking for pure, solid truth only, I should be thankful if this information could be sent me privately, for I don't see what good purpose can be served by a public newspaper discussion on such an abstruse question.

I am yours, etc.,

JNO. BATCHELOR.

THE TREATMENT OF RUSSIAN PRISONERS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I believe that the Japanese Government and upper officials have through all the war meant to treat the Russian prisoners of war justly, with as little needless severity as possible. I have been in almost constant close contact with Russian prisoners, their soldier keepers, their Red Cross doctors, and as one of their nurses from the beginning to the end of the war: I will not attempt to state or prove that all army officials not in close touch with the spirit of Tokyo have carried out that spirit in all places. I write now to ask you, as a fair-minded military man for your opinion of the justice of the treatment to which 13 officers and 5 soldiers were subjected here last week, remembering that the war has closed, that peace has been promulgated.

The 13 officers, some with grey beards, and five soldiers went on the night of December 16th to the theatre to see the moving pictures or kinoscope. Their permission allowed them to stay out until 10 o'clock. They left as they thought in time, but there was a delay at the door in getting their boots, so that they were 5 or 10 minutes late. At the entrance an armed patrol with an officer arrested them and took them to the headquarters, where they were left standing on open ground until about 12 o'clock, though one of the officers from past wounds having great difficulty to stand, was finally allowed to sit; others attempting to lean against the side of the guard house, were made to stand straight without support. It was a cold, raw night; it began to rain; some of the men were without over-coats, they asked to be allowed shelter; they were allowed to go to the open betto and horse shed where the horses and bettos of Japanese officers stand and sit while waiting on duty, and were kept there until about 10 o'clock the next morning, when the officer in charge of all the prisoners came and said it was a mistake, the fault of another officer. "I do not understand it," please pardon it—an excuse he has often made use of before in like unpleasant circumstances. The questions I would like to ask are, why or how can these gentlemen-officers be kept under such strict rules in time of peace? Is it allowable to treat imprisoned officers like bettos or horses even in time of war?

When intelligent, upright, respectable, honorable gentlemen who went through starvation, mental and physical strain, and all the indescribable horrors of war in that most dreadful siege, lying and fighting in the trenches sometimes four days at a time without food or sleep, say that it has been harder to hear their sufferings here in Matsuyama than all the sufferings of that awful time at Port Arthur, then I think that a real hero like Gen. Nogi would weep for them now and say, "Gently, gently!"

As these men have now no sufficient legal channel through which their grievances may be heard, I thank you in advance for the kindness of granting space in your columns and the answer I hope for to my questions.

Yours, respectfully,

H. FRANCES PARMELEE.

CHINESE IDEOGRAPHS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE JAPAN MAIL.)

SIR,—Your correspondents on this subject are all very interesting, and I hope that I may not trespass too much upon your patience if I note some methods of study that I have found useful. There is a large-type New Testament in Japanese that is known jocularly as the "Obisan" style. This has the side kana and the characters being large and clear they can be easily caught by the eye. This being done we can either obliterate the side kana of those that we know, or better do as the Japanese themselves do, "cut it out and forget it," reading from the Chinese character only. The text is not quite orthodox in one place at least that touches upon the Incarnation; but that makes no difference for our present purpose, which is the study of the Chinese text. I have also found Bishop Nicolai's large type New Testament very useful for the same purpose. On it the kana is kata kana and therefore easier for a beginner. The text is said by experts to follow the Greek very closely and is therefore a little tough for inward digestion. I have recently discovered the Chinese original (東教宗經) of the Holy Orthodox (教文經) which latter serves as an excellent "pony" for the former. It is a good plan to take a Chinese Bible or New Testament to any assembly where it is read in the ears of the people in our own language and let the eye recognize in the Chinese text what we hear in our own tongues of the wonderful works of God. In the daily services of the Church the Prayer Book in Chinese may be used in the same manner, the Japanese Prayer Book being the best possible introduction to it.

I am yours, etc., HENRY S. JEFFERYS.

MR. STORY REPLIES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—My attention has been called to an article in your issue of November 27 entitled "A Story by Mr. Story." The article in question is a modification by your reviewer of an interpretation by Mr. W. T. Stead of a "story" which assuredly never emanated from me.

As I have not had the opportunity to read Mr. Stead's reference to my book I cannot judge how far he has correctly represented my views. I can only say I have nowhere written or spoken in "accusation against the Japanese." I am now proceeding on a visit to Japan, and I beg that you will relieve me of the responsibility for the indictment of savage barbarity against the Japanese which I never made and which I do not possess evidence to confirm or controvert.

In common with my colleagues, Lord Brooke and Mr. Maurice Baring, I have confined myself in writing upon the late war solely to the description of events which occurred within my own knowledge.

I am, faithfully yours,

DOUGLAS STORY.

THE JUDGMENT IN THE SMITHERS LEASE CASE.

The text of the judgment delivered by the Kobe District Court on Dec. 5th in the action brought by Inouye Jenkichi against Mrs. Smithers, formerly of Kobe, has now been made public. It will be remembered, says the Kobe Herald, that in this case Plaintiff asked for the surrender of six lots of land in Nakayamate-dori, 3-chome, the cancellation of the registration of the lease of this property, and damages up to the date of judgment for the withholding of the enjoyment of the property. The judgment of the Court, as previously recorded, found in favour of the Plaintiff, with the exception of the claim for damages, which was dismissed. From the published statement of the reasons on which the judgment was based, we find that the Court held that the objection raised by the Defendant, to the effect that an action in regard to the same property had already been adjudicated, could not be upheld. The ground given for this ruling is that the present Plaintiff was not concerned in the previous proceedings and therefore cannot be bound by the judgment then given, which was in favour of Mrs. Smithers. The Court also considered that the subject matter of the present action was different to that in the previous case, inasmuch as the object of the present Plaintiff was to obtain a decision that the registration of the transfer of the superficies could not be set up against a third party who purchased the property after the time for its registration had expired. In regard to the main question, the validity of the registration of the superficies by Defendant, the Court pointed out that Defendant's legal representative admitted not only that the registration of the transfer of the superficies was not in accordance with Law No. 72 of 1900, but was made before that Law became operative. The registration therefore must be regarded independently of the provisions of that Law. Consequently, the only question to decide was whether or not the registration of the transfer was valid, as maintained by Defendant. The Court then proceeds to set forth that the registration was made in the foreign registry record and not in the general registration record. The point is, therefore, if a superficies which is not a perpetual lease (the superficies in this case is for a term of twenty-five years) comes under Ordinances Nos. 329 and 458 of 1899, which provide that a copy of a Registry Book of a Foreign Consulate has the same effect as a Japanese Registry book and that rights lawfully acquired by foreigners of juridical persons can be set up against third parties if registered within a given time. The Court goes on to state that it is of opinion that the Ordinances were intended only to apply to the registration of rights of property which are exclusively enjoyed by foreigners, in particular the perpetual leases, and not to rights which are equally open to Japanese and foreigners. The Ordinances, in fact, were intended to provide a procedure for the registration of foreign special rights, because such rights did not come under the Civil Code and the Registration Law. The Court therefore rejected the contention of Defendant's Counsel that the Ordinances apply to ordinary superficies. Consequently, Article 5 of the Ordinances, which provides that a copy of a foreign Consular registration record shall have the same effect as a Japanese Registry book, cannot be held to be applicable in this case. In the result, the Court holds that, while Defendant indisputably owned the building on the land and can be regarded as the superficies, she cannot set up her right of superficies as against the Plaintiff, who has not been shown to have acquired his rights with malicious intent.

BANNERMAN ON THE LIBERALS' POLICY.

London, December 22.

Speaking at a great Liberal meeting in the Albert Hall, London, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman said Mr. Balfour's attempts to shift the issue would not affect the nation's judgment.

He reaffirmed his adhesion to the alliance with Japan and to the entente with France. As regards Germany, he said he saw no cause for estrangement, and he welcomed the recent unofficial demonstration of friendship.

With regard to the nation's foreign relations generally, the Party was as strongly opposed as ever to a policy of aggression and adventure. The present fiscal system was the most powerful ally they could have in carrying out a policy of peaceful co-operation with all nations in the work of civilization.

There was no trace of the alleged tendency to disruption of the Empire, and no sign of friction except in South Africa, where the difficulties and complications were great. The Government had resolved to arrest forthwith as far as practicable the importation of Chinese.

The latest accounts from Moscow indicate that the revolutionists are continuing the struggle with extraordinary determination, though they are disappointed at the regular troops remaining loyal.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

The movement in favour of an Anglo-German friendship is extending in Germany. A series of meetings have been arranged with the approval of the Federal governments. The movement includes a banquet to be given by the Chambers of Commerce in Berlin to which the British Ambassador is invited.

DISTRACTED MOSCOW.

London, December 28.

A telegram from Moscow dated December 26, says that the barricades are extending. The rebels are still unsubdued and a large force of Cossacks have left St. Petersburg for Lithuania.

THE MOROCCO QUESTION.

Later.

The Sultan of Morocco has refused the conference at Madrid. He will agree only to Algiers or Tangier.

German policy in Morocco continues to be viewed with uneasiness and even anxiety on the continent.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

MR. TAKAHIRA.

Mr. Takahira, Japanese Minister to Washington, is expected to arrive in Yokohama by the Manchuria on the 3rd of January.

THE ITALIAN CABINET.

There has been a change of Cabinet in Italy. Signor Fortes becomes President of the Council and Minister for Home Affairs for the second time; Signor Giuliano is Minister for Foreign Affairs, and Admiral Zannelli is Minister of Marine.

THE FALL OF THE BALFOUR CABINET.

By December 1st the resignation of the Balfour Ministry was held in London to be an imminent fact. King Edward was to arrive at Buckingham Palace on Dec. 4th and to hold a Privy Council the following morning, and it was expected that the resignation of the Government would be announced on the 6th. But events marched even faster than was predicted, for on the 4th (which was a Monday) the expected intimation was made. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's acceptance of the duty to form a new Cabinet was of course a foregone conclusion. As the matter was bluntly put by the Liberal Daily News: "Suppose that in the event of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's refusal, Premier Balfour should advise King Edward to send for Joseph Chamberlain. This is doubtless a somewhat wild suggestion, but it cannot be doubted that Mr. Chamberlain would seize the opportunity to form a protectionist Government." This despite the repeated assertions from the Liberal side that "C.B." would not take office. Meantime the country was practically in the throes of an electoral campaign. The Unionists made a strong point of the Home Rule plank in the platform of the Liberals and said they were tied to the heels of Mr. John Redmond, the Irish Nationalist leader, while the Liberals were making the most of the divergencies in the views of the Unionists for and against protection. Lord Hugh Cecil, leader of the Conservative free traders, warned them against allowing Mr. Chamberlain to hang such a mill-stone round their necks as the Liberals had in Home Rule, and Mr. Redmond spoke of the paramountcy of the Home Rule question, beside which, he said, the question of the welfare and goodwill of the colonies sank into insignificance. English statesmen, he pointed out, ought to conciliate the good will of the Irish people, who constitute one of the greatest fighting forces in the world and whose sympathy was more valuable than any foreign alliance. On Sunday (3rd) secrecy was still maintained and Mr. Balfour played golf, but all doubts and uncertainties were dispelled on Monday when it was announced that the whole Cabinet had tendered their resignations, which were accepted, and that the King had invited Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman to an interview on the 5th. We reproduce a subsequent telegram:

London, December 5.

The following official announcement was made to-night: "Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman informed King Edward that he will be unable to submit his proposed arrangements in connection with the formation of a new Government until December 11th. King Edward left London this afternoon to visit Lord Alington at Cichel, Wimborne."

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman saw the King at Buckingham Palace this morning and accepted the task of forming a new Cabinet.

London, December 8.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, speaking at Oxford to-night, paid a striking tribute to Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, the retiring Premier, who he said, would leave a deep impression on the minds of his friends throughout the country. He asserted that nothing had arisen which in the slightest degree affected his personal or his political relations with Balfour.

Referring to the new Government, Chamberlain said the country had now passed into the hands of the home rulers and "Little Englanders." Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, it was his opinion, intended to give Ireland home rule by instalments on the hire system.

Chamberlain charged Sir Henry with having made a bargain with John Redmond along these lines. He asked what would be thought when a British Premier took his orders from the enemies of his country and when he used his high position to undermine the constitution which he was there to support.

Chamberlain then turned to finance matters, repeating his old arguments and contending that the suggested tax on wheat would be practically insignificant and would be compensated for in other ways.

Among those present at the meeting was Dr. William Osler, formerly of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, and now regius professor of medicine at Oxford, who moved a resolution calling for tariff reform as the best means of consolidating the empire. The resolution was carried with only one dissenting vote.

London, December 9.

The ultimatum issued by the Nationalist convention at Dublin, demanding Home Rule, has been promptly answered by an announcement which appears in the Spectator this morning. This publication, although a Unionist organ, has throughout strongly opposed Chamberlainism and now announces its intention to support the incoming Government as the only sure means of upholding free trade. In an evidently inspired paragraph the Spectator declares:

"The new Cabinet, if it commands a majority in the next Parliament, has no intention to introduce a home rule bill. It will not even appeal to the country for a mandate to endow Ireland with a separate Legislature. The essential issue to be placed before the electors will be the maintenance of free trade, and the opposition will be given no excuse to evade that question or to pretend that the home rule issue has taken its place."

The Spectator further expresses the belief that Sir Edward Grey will be appointed Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and says that it thinks that the foreign policy could not be placed in better hands. It is presumed, the Spectator is well informed, this would imply that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has succeeded in enlisting all sections of the Liberal party, including the partisans of Lord Rosebery, in the new Government, by giving assurances that no attempt will be made to tamper with the union and that no pre-election pledges will be given to John Redmond.

Whether or not Redmond, as Chamberlain asserts, has accepted the promise of some sort of concession from the Liberals in the nature of a stepping stone to home rule cannot yet be stated. It appears to be certain, however, that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman has practically completed his Cabinet and that King Edward will come to London in readiness to hold a council on Monday next for an exchange of seats between the outgoing and the incoming Secretaries. The indications, therefore, are that Redmond has acquiesced in some form of compromise so as to avert the danger of the general election resulting in another Unionist victory, which would throw Ireland's hopes again into the distant future.

The Times this morning says that Sir Edward Grey will probably become Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Campbell-Bannerman Cabinet, while all the Liberal imperialists except Lord Rosebery will hold important offices. The Times believes that Sir Robert Threshie Reid will become Lord High Chancellor; Herbert Henry Asquith, Secretary of the Exchequer; John Morley, Secretary for India; Lord Elgin, Secretary for the Colonies; Richard Burden Haldane, Secretary for War; Herbert Gladstone, Secretary for the Home Department; the Earl of Aberdeen, Viceroy for Ireland, and James Bryce, Chief Secretary for Ireland.

The Daily Chronicle this morning announces that David Lloyd George and John Burns, representatives respectively of the Radical and Labour parties, will be included in the new Government.

AUSTRALIA AND JAPANESE IMMIGRANTS.

In the Victoria House of Representatives on October 21st the Japanese Immigrant question came up on a question by Mr. J. C. Watson, leader of the Labour party, who asked whether the Government had under consideration any proposal to alter the immigration law as it related to the Japanese.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Deakin, said in reply that:—

He had, as Minister for External Affairs, communicated of his own volition with the Japanese Consul-General in order to come to some understanding by means by which visitors, tourists or traders could be received in Australia without having to pass an educational test; and it was arranged that a passport should be given to admit them to Australia. These negotiations were concluded during the time Mr. Watson was in office; only on two occasions had that course been pursued, and the Japanese Consul had shown every anxiety to protect Australia in the matter. As to the length of time for which the permits were granted, that all depended on the object of the visit. Since then he had, of his own accord, reopened negotiations with the Consul-General—not with the Government of Japan—in order to see whether it was possible to extend this passport system in reference to the same class of persons, or to other classes, visiting the Commonwealth, but at the same time preserving the existing law, and making no change in policy in regard to residents. An article in the press indicated that the desire was that there should be extended to Japan a concession which the Commonwealth authorities had made to India, but as a matter of fact Japan had already been in enjoyment of the privilege for some 12 or 15 months, and the present proposal was to see whether the system was capable of extension. It was quite true that the Japanese Government desired to limit the number of emigrants from Japan to Australia. There was a statement to the effect: "Mr. Deakin admits the equity of the Japanese claim," and the article went on to say that an agreement would have to be entered into so that the Japanese would not be excluded from Australia "by the education test law." That statement, however, was only correct so far as it related to passports now issued on the extension of the passport system. The fact, therefore, was that he was not able to inform the House that the Government had arrived at any conclusion, because no arrangement had yet been come to. It was true, in reconsidering the Immigration Restriction Act—as he had more than once informed the House—that it was not only an amendment of the contract labour clauses which were under consideration. If it were possible, when considering the general principles of the immigration restriction policy, to alter it in any from—without altering it substantially—so as to meet the susceptibilities of the people of Japan, or any other people, he would be glad to do it—

A Labour Member; Mere hypocrisy. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Deakin: Any alteration on the lines suggested could only be done by the consent of the House; but in the first instance which he directed to the Government of Japan he held out no prospect of making any alteration in the general policy of the Commonwealth in relation to immigration; but the effect of that policy—whether in relation to the Japanese or any other people—should be to carry it out in such a way as not to cast any undue reflection upon them as a nation. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Joseph Cook: This seems to be very satisfactory all round. (Laughter.)

When seen after the Prime Minister's statement Mr. J. C. Watson, leader of the Labour party, said:—

Mr. Deakin was quite correct in saying the Labour Ministry brought to a conclusion the negotiations which he had initiated with the Japanese with respect to the admission of visitors, whether traders or tourists, on passports signed by the Japanese authorities and endorsed by the British consul in Japan. With regard to that matter, I see no objection to giving every facility to men of that class coming to Australia as they do not remain here permanently as settlers. The Japanese Government has all along stated that it does not desire that its people should emigrate. On the contrary, it is anxious to retain them in Japan. With respect to the suggestion that retaliatory measures are contemplated by the Japanese authorities, I can only say we have no desire that our people should become residents of Japan. Beyond that we should be quite satisfied if they extend the same courteous treatment of our trade or touring visitors that we are prepared to extend to the Japanese. With regard to Mr. Deakin's suggestion to amend the act in some way so as to show consideration for the feelings of the Japanese, I would like to see the amendment before I express any opinion. I don't think the people of Australia will sympathise with any proposal to at all weaken the attitude hitherto assumed towards coloured immigration generally."

EXPORTS.

RAW SILK.

The position of the market and prices remain unchanged. At these figures foreign buyers are shy and do not take more than they can help, and the bulk of recent shipments to America have been on native account. Holders struggle very hard to maintain rates and have so far been successful, although it seems that buyers will not operate freely at such prices. If holders were a little more accommodating a larger business would no doubt be done.

BAD COMPLEXIONS

Dry Thin and Falling Hair and Red Rough Hands Prevented by

CUTICURA SOAP

MILLIONS use CUTICURA SOAP, assisted by CUTICURA OINTMENT, for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, for cleansing the scalp of crusts, scales, and dandruff, and the stopping of falling hair, for softening, whitening, and soothing red, rough, and sore hands, for baby rashes, itchings, and chafings, in the form of baths for annoying irritations and inflammations, or too free or offensive perspiration, in the form of washes, for ulcerative weaknesses, and for many sanative, antiseptic, cleansing purposes which readily suggest themselves to women, especially mothers, and for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. CUTICURA SOAP combines delicate emollient properties derived from CUTICURA OINTMENT, the great skin cure, with the purest of cleansing ingredients and the most refreshing of flower odours. No other medicated soap is to be compared with it for preserving, purifying, and beautifying the skin, scalp, hair, and hands. No other foreign or domestic toilet soap, however expensive, is to be compared with it for all the purposes of the toilet, bath, and nursery. Thus it combines in ONE SOAP at ONE PRICE, the best skin and complexion soap, and the best toilet and baby soap in the world.

COMPLETE EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL TREATMENT FOR EVERY HUMOUR,

Consisting of CUTICURA SOAP, to cleanse the skin of crusts and scales, and soften the thickened cuticle; CUTICURA OINTMENT, to instantly allay itching, inflammation, and irritation, and soothe and heal; and CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS, to cool and cleanse the blood. A SINGLE SET is often sufficient to cure torturing, disgusting humours, eczema, rashes, and irritations, with loss of hair, when all else fails. Sold throughout the world. Australian Depot: E. Towns & Co., Sydney. British Depot: 27-28, Charterhouse Sq., London. French Depot: 6 Rue de la Paix, Paris. FORTER DRUG AND CHEM. CO., Sole Props., Boston, U.S.A.

CUTICURA RESOLVENT PILLS (Chocolate Coated) are a new, tasteless, odourless, economical substitute for the old-branded liquid CUTICURA RESOLVENT, as well as for all other blood purifiers and humour cures. Put up in screw-cap pocket vials, containing 50 doses. CUTICURA PILLS are alterative, antiseptic, tonic, and digestive, and beyond question the purest, sweetest, most successful and economical blood and skin purifiers, humour cures, and tonic-digestives, yet compounded.
